Senate amendment No. 817 strikes out this provision, but amendment No. 825 reinserts it at a later portion of the bill, with clarifying changes. The House recedes on amendment No. 817 and recedes from its disagreement on amendment No. 825 with clarifying changes.

On amendments Nos. 818 and 826: Section 1008 of the House bill provided that if the provisions of existing law imposing the tax on personal-service corporations should be held unconstitutional such corporations shall pay for the years 1918 to 1921, inclusive, a tax equal to the income and war-profits and excess-profits taxes imposed for such years by the revenue act of 1918 unless they elected not to exercise their rights under the decision declaring such tax unconstitutional. Senate amendment No. 818 strikes out this provision, but amendment No. 826 inserts it at a later part of the bill, with clarifying changes, chiefly due to the form of the bill, explained in connection with amendment No. 3. The House recedes on amendment No. 818 and recedes from its disagreement to amendment No. 826 with an amendment making clerical changes.

On amendments Nos. 819 and 829: Section 1009 of the House bill authorizes the Treasury Department to have outstanding at any one time $7,500,000,000 of notes (as distinguished from certificates of indebtedness or long-time bonds) in place of $7,000,000,000 of such notes in the aggregate, authorized by existing law. Senate amendment No. 819 strikes out this provision, but amendment No. 829 restores it in identical language in a later part of the bill; and the House recedes on both amendments.

On amendment No. 820: This amendment inserts a heading to a section; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 821: This amendment is a clerical change; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 822: This amendment is a clerical change made necessary by the repeal and reenactment of the revenue act of 1918 instead of its amendment in specified particulars, as explained in connection with amendment No. 3; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 823: This amendment inserts, for the reason explained in connection with amendment No. 3, with clerical changes, the provisions of existing law authorizing the deposit of United States bonds in lieu of sureties in case of surety bonds required to be furnished to the United States, and broadens the provision to extend like privilege to the case of United States notes. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 824: This amendment inserts, for the reason explained in connection with amendment No. 3, the provisions of existing law relating to the issue of stamps in place of lost stamps for distilled spirits, tobacco, cigars, snuff, cigarettes, fermented liquors, and wines; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 825: The effect of this amendment and the action of the conferees thereon has been explained in connection with amendment No. 817.

On amendment No. 826: The effect of this amendment and the action of the conferees thereon has been explained in connection with amendment No. 818.

On amendment No. 827: This amendment inserts a heading to a title of the bill; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 828: This amendment, in pursuance of the general policy of the House bill to repeal all the provisions of the revenue act of 1918 not incorporated in this act, repeals all of Titles II, III, IV, V, VII, VIII, IX, X, XI, and XII of the revenue act of 1918, and also repeals sections 628, 629, and 630 of such act (being the tax on soft drinks, ice cream, and similar articles) and also sections 1314, 1315, 1316, 1317, 1319, and 1320 of such act, which are certain administrative provisions; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 829: The effect of this amendment and the action of the conferees thereon has been explained in connection with amendment No. 819.

On amendment No. 830: This amendment increases the amount of war-saving certificates which a single individual may hold from $1,000 to $5,000; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 831: This amendment inserts the usual clause providing that if any provision of the act is unconstitutional this shall not affect the remainder of the act; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 832: This amendment inserts a heading to a section; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 833: This amendment is a clerical change; and the House recedes.

HOOR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday next. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, is it the purpose to devote all of Monday to this conference report?

Mr. MONDELL. That is my thought, that it will probably take all day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is not probable that there will be any other business transacted on Monday?

Mr. MONDELL. I have no other business in mind at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

PROTECTION OF MATERNITY AND INFANCY.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1039.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HUSTED in the chair.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be considered as an original bill and considered section by section in the usual manner.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the House amendment to the Senate bill be read for amendment as an original bill section by section and considered as an original bill. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, it seems to me that the Members of the House have had an opportunity to read this bill and to reread it sufficiently to understand everything that there is in it. It will take a lot of time, unnecessarily, to go through the reading of it, and I shall object.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair be good enough to state the request again?

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from Massachusetts is that the House amendment be read in lieu of the Senate bill section by section, subject to amendment as an original bill.

Mr. RANKIN. I object.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Mississippi will permit, as I understand it, his reason for objecting is to save time?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon his objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there are hereby authorized to be appropriated annually, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sums specified in section 2 of this act, to be paid to the several States for the purpose of cooperating with them in promoting the care of maternity and infancy as hereinafter provided.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 1 of the Senate bill and insert in lieu thereof the committee amendment, and I give notice that if the amendment be adopted I shall move to strike out the subsequent sections when they may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINSLOW: Strike out all of section 1 of the Senate bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sums specified in section 2 of this act, to be paid to the several States for the purpose of cooperating with them in promoting the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy as hereinafter provided.

"Sec. 2. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the current fiscal year $480,000, to be equally apportioned among the several States, and for each subsequent year, for the period of five years, $240,000, to be equally apportioned among the several States in the manner hereinafter provided: Provided, That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the use of the States, subject to the provisions of this act, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, an additional sum of $1,000,000, and annually thereafter, for the period of five years, an additional sum not to exceed $1,000,000: Provided further, That the additional appropriations herein authorized shall be apportioned $5,000 to each State and the balance among the States in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the United States, not including outlying possessions, according to the last preceding United States census: And provided further, That no payment out of the additional appropriation herein authorized shall be made in any year to any State until an equal sum has been appropriated for that year by the legislature of such State for the maintenance of the services and facilities provided for in this act.

"So much of the amount apportioned to any State for any fiscal year as remains unpaid to such State at the close thereof shall be available for expenditures in that State until the close of the succeeding fiscal year.

"Sec. 3. There is hereby created a board of maternity and infant hygiene, which shall consist of the Chief of the Children's Bureau, the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, and the United States Commissioner of Education, and which is hereafter designated in this act as the board. The board shall elect its own chairman and perform the duties provided for in this act.

The Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor shall be charged with the administration of this act, except as herein otherwise provided, and the Chief of the Children's Bureau shall be the executive officer. It shall be the duty of the Children's Bureau to make or cause to be made such studies, investigations, and reports as will promote the efficient administration of this act.

"Sec. 4. In order to secure the benefits of the appropriations authorized in section 2 of this act any State shall, through the legislative authority thereof, accept the provisions of this act and designate or authorize the creation of a State agency with which the Children's Bureau shall have all necessary powers to cooperate as herein provided in the administration of the provisions of this act: Provided, That in any State having a child welfare or child hygiene division in its State agency of health, the said State agency of health shall administer the provisions of this act through such divisions. If the legislature of any State has not made provision for accepting the provisions of this act the governor of such State may, in so far as he is authorized to do so by the laws of such State, accept the provisions of this act and designate or create a State agency to cooperate with the Children's Bureau until the adjournment of the first regular session of the legislature in such State following the passage of this act.

"Sec. 5. So much, not to exceed 5 per cent of the additional appropriations authorized for any fiscal year under section 2 of this act, as the Children's Bureau may estimate to be necessary for administering the provisions of this act, as herein provided, shall be deducted for that purpose, to be available until expended.

"Sec. 6. Out of the amounts authorized under section 5 of this act the Children's Bureau is authorized to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, to be taken from the eligible lists of the Civil Service Commission, and to purchase such supplies, material, equipment, office fixtures, and apparatus, and to incur such travel and other expense as it may deem necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act.

"Sec. 7. Within 60 days after any appropriation authorized by this act has been made, the Children's Bureau shall make the apportionment herein provided for and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount estimated by the bureau to be necessary for administering the provisions of this act, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the treasurers of the various States the amount which has been apportioned to each State for the fiscal year for which such appropriation has been made.

"Sec. 8. Any State desiring to receive the benefits of this act shall, by its agency described in section 4, submit to the Children's Bureau detailed plans for carrying out the provisions of this act within such State, which plans shall be subject to the approval of the board: Provided, That the plans of the States under this act shall provide that no official, or agent, or representative in carrying out the provisions of this act shall enter any home or take charge of any child over the objection of the parents, or either of them, or the person standing in loco parentis or having custody of such child. If these plans shall be in conformity with the provisions of this act and reasonably appropriate and adequate to carry out its purposes they shall be approved by the board and due notice of such approval shall be sent to the State agency by the chief of the Children's Bureau.

"Sec. 9. No official, agent, or representative of the Children's Bureau shall by virtue of this act have any right to enter any home over the objection of the owner thereof, or take charge of any child over the objection of the parents, or either of them, or of the person standing in loco parentis or having custody of such child. Nothing in this act shall be construed as limiting the power of a parent or guardian or person standing in loco parentis to determine what treatment or correction shall be provided for a child or the agency or agencies to be employed for such purpose.

"Sec. 10. Within 60 days after any appropriation authorized by this act has been made, and as often thereafter while such appropriation remains unexpended as changed conditions may warrant, the Children's Bureau shall ascertain the amounts that have been appropriated by the legislatures of the several States accepting the provisions of this act and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount to which each State is entitled under the provisions of this act. Such certificate shall state (1) that the State has, through its legislative authority, accepted the provisions of this act and designated or authorized the creation of an agency to cooperate with the Children's Bureau, or that the State has otherwise accepted this act, as provided in section 4 hereof; (2) the fact that the proper agency of the State has submitted to the Children's Bureau detailed plans for carrying out the provisions of this act, and that such plans have been approved by the board; (3) the amount, if any, that has been appropriated by the legislature of the State for the maintenance of the services and facilities of this act, as provided in section 2 hereof; and (4) the amount to which the State is entitled under the provisions of this act. Such certificate, when in conformity with the provisions hereof, shall, until revoked as provided in section 12 hereof, be sufficient authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to make payment to the State in accordance therewith.

"Sec. 11. Each State agency cooperating with the Children's Bureau under this act shall make such reports concerning its operations and expenditures as shall be prescribed or requested by the bureau. The Children's Bureau may, with the approval of the board, and shall, upon request of a majority of the board, withhold any further certificate provided for in section 10 hereof whenever it shall be determined as to any State that the agency thereof has not properly expended the money paid to it or the moneys herein required to be appropriated by such State for the purposes and in accordance with the provisions of this act. Such certificate may be withheld until such time or upon such conditions as the Children's Bureau, with the approval of the board, may determine; when so withheld the State agency may appeal to the President of the United States, who may either affirm or reverse the action of the bureau with such directions as he shall consider proper: Provided, That before any such certificate shall be withheld from any State, the chairman of the board shall give notice in writing to the authority designated to represent the State, stating specifically wherein said State has failed to comply with the provisions of this act.

"Sec. 12. No portion of any moneys apportioned under this act for the benefit of the States shall be applied, directly or indirectly, to the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair of any building or buildings or equipment, or for the purchase or rental of any buildings or lands, nor shall any such moneys or moneys required to be appropriated by any State for the purposes and in accordance with the provisions of this act be used for the payment of any maternity or infancy pension, stipend, or gratuity.

"Sec. 13. The Children's Bureau shall perform the duties assigned to it by this act under the supervision of the Secretary of Labor, and he shall include in his annual report to Congress a full account of the administration of this act and expenditures of the moneys herein authorized.

"Sec. 14. This act shall be construed as intending to secure to the various States control of the administration of this act within their respective States, subject only to the provisions and purposes of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I send to the desk, which is an amendment to the amendment, and I ask to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEA of California: On page 9, before the word "United" in line 22, insert the words "States of the," and on line 23 strike out the words "not including outlying possessions."

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is simply to correct the arithmetic of the bill. The bill provides for the distribution of this money among the States in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the United States. The District of Columbia, of course, is a part of the United States, but does not participate in the funds distributed. Therefore under the provisions of the bill there will be several thousand dollars undisposed of, and I suggest this amendment in order to obviate that contingency.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAYTON: Page 10, line 5, after the word "act," insert: "Provided further, That no part of the Federal appropriation hereby provided shall be used or available until the legislatures of 25 States shall by act or resolution signify their desire for the institution and continuance of the proposed service and shall have appropriated from State funds their respective quotas as therein indicated."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to take up more than a minute and a half. I suppose there is no one in this body at this time who has not expected me to offer an amendment of this kind. If I have been understood properly ever since this debate has begun, then Members understand that my opposition to this is because I believe it to be Federal intervention against the rights of the communities and the States. I have offered this amendment to give the Members of the House a chance to see whether or not the people of the country as represented in their various States, viz, being a majority of the 48 States of the Union, wish to have this sort of legislation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, before this amendment is voted on I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, for a moment. There are one or two matters that I would like to get cleared up in my own mind if I can, bearing on the financial feature. I was very much struck by some statistics quoted by the lady from Oklahoma [Miss ROBERTSON] and by other Members. In the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, is the amount of money appropriated or authorized to be appropriated in this bill, to put it bluntly, sufficient to do any good?

Mr. WINSLOW. That is a pretty broad inquiry. To answer your question categorically, I think it will do some good. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, it will be sufficient to carry out the purposes of the act as disclosed in the hearings before the committee?

Mr. WINSLOW. No. I do not think it would, as disclosed in the hearings, but the committee did not build up this bill on what was advanced at the hearings. They discarded that testimony and proceeded to make a bill to accomplish the work as they understood it to be intended.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, may I ask the gentleman—

Mr. WINSLOW. If the gentleman will pardon me, he will understand that the hearings were on a different bill from this one, a bill which had other provisions and possibilities.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, the principle which runs through this bill ran through the original bill.

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes; but there was a certain lack of principle in that bill which does not run through this one. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman anticipate that the authorizations that are provided for in this bill will be all that will be requested within the 5-year period?

Mr. WINSLOW. Again, answering you specifically in reply to your inquiry, I would judge from the experience I have had here in my short time that probably very much more will be requested, but whether it will be granted or not is another consideration.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would the gentleman object to telling us, if he has the estimate, what the cost would be to carry out the purposes of the original bill—the Senate bill?

Mr. WINSLOW. I am not able to do it as a matter of knowledge, based on any information submitted, and I feel entirely incompetent to make a personal estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

On page 11, line 14, after the word "until" insert "six months after."

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is simply this: A number of States have referendum laws, under which a State law enacted by the legislature does not go into effect until three months or six months or other length of time after the legislature has adjourned. The first section of the bill provides that a governor may accept the provisions of this act and authorize a State agency to cooperate under it until the adjournment of the next session of the legislature. Without this amendment, there would be a hiatus until the State law went into effect. So for the purpose of correcting that situation I offer that amendment.

Mr. WINSLOW. The committee will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW].

Mr. DENISON. I wish to offer a slight amendment. On page 10, line 11, there is a misprint. The word "infant" should be "infancy."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DENISON: Page 10, line 11, strike out the word "infant" and insert in lieu thereof the word "infancy."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the informal amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was it the intention of the committee to have this board called a "board of maternity and infancy hygiene" rather than "infant hygiene"? It seems to me the words carried in the bill are better descriptive of the purposes, namely, "board of maternity and infant hygiene." Now, you propose to call it a "board of maternity and infancy hygiene." I think it is better as reported.

Mr. DENISON. It is clearly a misprint, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I believe the gentleman is mistaken. It is not a misprint, and the word "infant" is proper there. The word "infant" is here an adjective. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the idea? We are creating what? A board of maternity. What else are we creating? A board of "infant hygiene," and not a board of "infancy hygiene."

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is not hygiene as controlled by infancy.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, this is merely a question of grammar. I think the word "infancy" ought to be inserted in place of the word "infant." The word "infant" as used here is merely an adjective, and it should be a noun.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, the committee will have to object to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I did not know that there was any objection on the part of the committee to that amendment, and inasmuch as the chairman has made that announcement I will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question again recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW]. The Clerk at the desk calls the attention of the Chair to an apparent error on page 15, line 16. The Clerk will report the apparent error.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the change be made to "such money or moneys."

Mr. VAILE. I think that correction is bad. This money is to be appropriated for the benefit of the States, and it is not such money as is required to be appropriated by the States. I think it should stand as it is.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think this is correct.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to withdraw my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me, I do not think that is a correct statement. It is not the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts; it is a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts and not a committee amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the remaining sections of the Senate bill be stricken out as a block.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the remaining sections be stricken out en bloc. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH as Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. HUSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (S. 1039) for the public protection of maternity and infancy and providing a method of cooperation between the Government of the United States and the several States, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill as amended.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks for the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and be counted. The Chair will count all Members standing. [After counting.] Eighty Members—a sufficient number.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those in favor of the passage of the bill as amended will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The questions was taken; and there were—yeas 279, nays 39, answered "present" 1, not voting 113, as follows:

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. JEFFERS, who is seriously ill at his home, has a general pair. Had he been present, he would have voted for the passage of this bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Reserving the right to object, is it understood that these gentlemen will extend only their own remarks and that the Record is not to be padded full of editorials and other reprints?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the request was not worded in that way.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I modify my request in that way.

Mr. ROBSION. I do the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the others ought to modify their requests in the same way.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not care to assume the responsibility of an offensive censorship, but I think it is the consensus of opinion of the House generally that these extensions of remarks should be confined strictly to the language of the Member.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the requests of the several gentlemen, with the understanding that the extensions will include only the Members' own remarks? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting some remarks of my colleague from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and of Col. Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan being extended in the RECORD, but it has been the policy to exclude remarks of others, and to that I object.

Mr. CRAMTON. The remarks are very brief; they can not well be divided. Exclusive of the heading they will not occupy over a quarter of a column.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan separate and distinct from the other?

Mr. CRAMTON. It was one service, and I would not care to divide it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan, but to the other I object.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 7294) supplemental to the national prohibition act, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 172) declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan, the pending question being on the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by Mr. WALSH of Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I notice the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is in his seat this morning, and I desire to inquire of him, because he was not here when I mentioned the matter on Saturday afternoon, if his attention was called since to the testimony to the effect that in one district over which the witness presided he had employed workers on primary day and paid them $7 apiece?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not catch the full import of the Senator's remark. To whom is he referring?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Michigan on Saturday, due to his unfamiliarity with the details of the record, advised the Senate that no worker was out on primary day. Thereafter, while the Senator was absent from the Chamber, I read to the Senate testimony disclosing that workers were hired to work on primary day and were paid $7 a head.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do remember indistinctly that there was some such testimony. I do know, however, that the chairman of the Newberry senatorial committee ordered or directed that no workers should be employed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I notice that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] is now in his seat. If he will give me his attention for a moment, I desire to say that on Saturday last he said something—I do not claim to quote his exact words—which obviously conveyed the impression that Chief Justice White in his opinion had disposed of this controversy. I adverted in the opening of my discussion of this subject to the opinions of the Supreme Court in the case that went to that court and stated, in substance, the attitude taken by Chief Justice White.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I interrupt the Senator from Montana to ask him to what testimony he was referring when he addressed himself to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will call the attention of the Senator to that directly—as soon as I have disposed of the matter to which I have just referred.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator from Montana misunderstood my position.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I shall be very glad to be corrected.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Chief Justice White differed from the majority of the court as to the law, but he swept the bribery charge out of the case.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; that is, as to the subject of the bribery of voters.

I read from the opinion of Chief Justice White what was read by the Senator from Georgia on Saturday, and also the following paragraph, which may have escaped his attention.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I only went so far as to state that Chief Justice White had swept the charge of bribery out of the case.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read from Chief Justice White's opinion, as follows:

The fifth count charged a conspiracy on the part of the defendants to commit a great number, to wit, 1,000, offenses against the United States, each to consist of giving money and things of value to a person to vote for Newberry at said election, and a great number, to wit, 1,000, other offenses against the United States, each to consist of giving money and things of value to a person to withhold his vote from Henry Ford at said general election. The sixth count charged a conspiracy to defraud by use of the mails.

The portion to which the Senator refers reads:

At the trial, before the submission of the case to the jury, the court put the fifth count entirely out of the case by instructing the jury to disregard it, as there was no evidence whatever to sustain it.

That is, the charge that there was a conspiracy to bribe voters to vote for Newberry "at the trial, before the submission of the case to the jury."

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I ask the Senator from Montana to read the next sentence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. My recollection is that in the very next sentence the Chief Justice says: "Therefore, the charge of bribery disappears."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I intend to read that. The opinion of the Chief Justice continues:

The bribery charge, therefore, disappeared. The second, third, and fourth counts, dealing, as I have said, with one general subject, were found by the court to be all in substance contained in the first count. They were, therefore, by direction of the court, either eliminated or consolidated with the first count. Thus, as contained in that count, the matters charged in the first four counts were submitted to the jury, as was also the sixth count; but the latter we need not further consider, as upon it there was a verdict of not guilty.

The case therefore reduces itself solely to the matters covered in the first count. That count charged a conspiracy on the part of the defendants, 135 in number, including Newberry, to commit an offense against the United States—that is, the offense on the part of Newberry of violating the corrupt practices act—

I am taking up this matter for the special information of the Senator from Georgia, but I notice he has been called from the Chamber. The opinion continues—by giving, contributing, expending, and using and by causing to be given, contributed, expended, and used, in procuring his nomination and election as such Senator at said primary and general elections, a sum in excess of the amount which he might lawfully give, contribute, expend, or use, and cause to be given, contributed, expended, or used for such purpose under the laws of Michigan, and in excess of $10,000, to wit, the sum of $100,000; and on the part of the other defendants of aiding, counseling, inducing, and procuring Newberry as such candidate to give, contribute, expend, and use, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, or used, said large and excessive sum, in order to procure his nomination and election.

That is to say, Mr. President, that the court dismissed that count that Newberry was charged with having entered into a conspiracy to bribe voters, but left for determination by the jury the count in which it was charged that Newberry had entered into a conspiracy to contribute and expend more than the sum limited by law. Upon that question the Chief Justice held that the jury had been erroneously instructed. So the whole matter that is here was left wholly undetermined by the court.

I may say in this connection that the evidence to which I adverted was not introduced for the purpose of showing that any voter was bribed, but it was introduced for the purpose of showing that men were unlawfully hired to go about the State and work for Newberry, urging voters to vote for him. I repeat, for the information of the Senator from Georgia, that it is perfectly obvious, as stated by me, that the Chief Justice—who, of course, spoke only for himself, not for the court, for the opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McReynolds—the Chief Justice called attention to the fact that the bribery count was out of the case, but there was left for consideration and determination by the court the count charging a conspiracy to contribute and expend more than the lawful amount.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, it is nothing unusual for the members of the Supreme Court to concur in on different grounds, and, as I understand, Chief Justice White did concur on a different ground, to wit, he held that the Federal law was constitutional while the majority of the court held that it was not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, every Justice agreed that the judgment should be reversed; there is not any question about that. Five of them said it should be reversed because the act was unconstitutional and four of them said the act was constitutional but that an error had been made in instructing the jury in reference to the charge in count 1. That is the state of the record. They all agreed that the count charging conspiracy to bribe was out of the case.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the judgment of the court as delivered by the Justice representing the majority decided the case solely on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the law, and not a word is said about any other question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Entirely so.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. Is it not a fair statement to say, as the Senator from Montana has already intimated, that the five justices who decided that the law was unconstitutional and void concerned themselves with nothing more than the technical legal construction of the act, and therefore they agreed to reverse the case without remanding it, and that ended their decision; but every one of the other four justices, including the Chief Justice, who did not think the law was absolutely void and who were therefore free to discuss the merits of the case condemned the interpretation of the trial judge by which alone a verdict of guilty was possible in that case?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not agree with the Senator at all. Justice Pitney, expressing the views of Mr. Justice Clarke and Justice Brandeis, said that the case was properly submitted to the jury; that there was evidence enough to warrant the jury in returning a verdict of guilty on the first count; but they said also that the instruction was erroneous. So far as the majority of the court is concerned, I do not agree with the Senator from Missouri at all about that. It is true that that is all the majority of the court concerned themselves with, so far as the opinion is concerned, but the Senator will not dispute the proposition that the Supreme Court never holds an act unconstitutional until it is confronted with that proposition as necessary to the determination of the case.

Mr. SPENCER. I quite agree with that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; so that if the court thought that the evidence was wholly insufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty, they never would have reached the constitutional question.

Mr. SPENCER. I can not agree with that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is my view.

Mr. SPENCER. A constitutional question when it is clearly presented to the court and is clearly involved in the case is decided. The five majority justices who rendered the decision of the court held, as the Senator from Montana so clearly states, that the law was unconstitutional, and that is all they were concerned with. They did not discuss the merits of the case at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course not.

Mr. SPENCER. We agree as to that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We agree as to that.

Mr. SPENCER. Four justices who did not think that the law was unconstitutional, and among those four justices was the Chief Justice, commented upon the trial and commented upon the instruction, and they show in their opinion that the instruction under which the verdict of guilty was brought in was a misapplication of the law and was unfair.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. SPENCER. And that no verdict that was rendered by the jury based upon that instruction could possibly stand.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course.

Mr. SPENCER. That is the contention.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We agree about that; the instruction was wrong, and that is all there is to that.

Mr. SPENCER. And the instruction went right to the heart of the matter.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, by no means, because Mr. Justice Pitney declares that the case was properly submitted to the jury and there was evidence enough to sustain a verdict of guilty upon an appropriate and proper instruction.

Mr. SPENCER. The language of the Chief Justice is clear, and he says:

I am nevertheless of opinion that there should be a judgment of reversal without prejudice—

That means to a new trial—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. SPENCER. He continues:

because of the grave misapprehension and grievous misapplication of the statute upon which the conviction and sentence below were based.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course.

Mr. SPENCER. There could not be anything clearer than that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Chief Justice said the instruction was wrong; that it misapplied the law, and therefore he concurred in reversal; but, Mr. President, because this aspect of the matter, which is not open to discussion at all, has been presented, I read from the opinion of Mr. Justice Pitney again. He says:

Since the majority of the court hold that the act is invalid, it would serve no useful purpose to spend time in discussing those assignments of error that relate to the conduct of the trial. It may be said, however, that, in my opinion—the trial court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendants for want of evidence of the alleged conspiracy.

In other words, the court properly let the matter go to the jury upon the question as to whether the defendants were guilty of the conspiracy as charged in the first count of the indictment—that is to say, there was evidence enough to warrant the jury in finding them guilty if they had been properly instructed. That is what this decision means.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to quote from Mr. Justice Pitney's opinion a few words following what he read?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will read the whole thing.

Mr. SPENCER. No; I do not ask to have that done. It is the beginning of the next paragraph, where he says:

I find prejudicial error, however—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, he found prejudicial error.

Mr. SPENCER. Let me finish the sentence:

I find prejudicial error, however, in that part of the charge which assumed to define the extent to which a candidate must participate in expenditures beyond the amount limited in order that he may be held to have violated the prohibition—

And here is what I call the Senator's attention to:

An instruction vitally important because it was largely upon overt acts supposed to have been done in carrying out the alleged conspiracy that the Government relied to prove the making of the conspiracy and its character.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course.

Mr. SPENCER. In other words, if it had not been for that instruction, the verdict, as I read it, could not have followed. The Chief Justice says the verdict was based upon that instruction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, well, I do not want to discuss that matter at all. I supposed that I was discussing this matter with somebody who desired to talk about it in a lawyerlike way.

Mr. SPENCER. May I say to the Senator—I will say it a little later, however.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. All right.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator knows the fairness of what I am saying. The Senator knows the legality of what I am saying. The Senator, in his calm moments of justice, is a lawyer of great ability, and he knows what those decisions mean.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And he is a lawyer right now, too.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call the attention of the Senate and of the Senator to the fact that again saying that the opinion of the Supreme Court does not pass upon the facts; it put the opinion of the court solely upon the constitutionality of the act. The only reference to the facts is in the paragraph that I will now read:

It should not be forgotten—

This is the opinion of the court. This is not any dissenting opinion of one justice or another justice. It is the opinion of the court—

It should not be forgotten that, exercising inherent police power, the State may suppress whatever evils may be incident to primary or convention. As "each House shall be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own Members," and as Congress may by law regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections, the National Government is not without power to protect itself against corruption, fraud, or other malign influences.

The necessary implication from that being that the majority of the court believed, as stated in this opinion, that the Senate itself was the forum to pass upon this question, and the court believed, from the facts that were adduced before it in that record, that it ought to pass on it; that they were amply sufficient for it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator indulge me again?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the Senator explain to the Senate why there has been no new trial?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it needs no explanation. The court held that the Federal statute, upon which the jurisdiction of the Federal court rests so far as the primary is concerned, is unconstitutional, and no prosecution can be had under it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. There are the Michigan statutes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. To be sure, Mr. President; but the Michigan statutes will not afford a basis for a prosecution in the Federal courts.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. What about the State courts?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, well, of course, the authorities of the State of Michigan may prosecute in the Michigan courts if they care to do so.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Why have they not done so?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Really, the Senator ought not to be doubtful about that. If Mr. Newberry was able thus to control the votes of the State of Michigan through the employment of practically every county officer in the State of Michigan, how easy it would be for him to control the enforcement of the criminal law!

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Has Mr. Ford no control in Michigan?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Perhaps the Senator has not had very much experience about this matter in our State; but the State of Montana has been brought into somewhat unenviable notoriety in this matter of the purchase of seats in the United States Senate. Does the Senator remember the case of Senator Clark, from my State?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No prosecution was ever had in that case.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Why not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Simply because the same influence that controlled the election controlled the machinery of the criminal law.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Then the Senator's State is in a worse fix than mine.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I dare say. It is no worse than the State of Michigan, though.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not know about that, and I do not think the Senator from Montana knows.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We have reformed in that regard, to some extent at least.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. No warrant has been sworn out, and Henry Ford could have sworn out a warrant any day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No warrant was sworn out in Montana, either; and yet six members of the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections reported against Senator Clark, and he resigned rather than have the matter come to a hearing in this Chamber.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Did he not come back by appointment of the governor?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the appointment of the governor was contested, and he never took his seat under that appointment; and a subsequent election was held, and at that election he was returned.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It is the same thing in effect.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I now proceed with the argument as I was prosecuting it when the recess was taken on Saturday.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a minute?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Townsend] asked for a reference to the record on the question of paying primary workers. Two men appear in the record, one of whom paid workers $5 a day, and the other paid them $7 a day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator have the kindness to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to their testimony?

Mr. CARAWAY. May I do it now?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If you please.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to direct the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Townsend] to the evidence of the employment of workers on primary day.

Frank P. Bohn (record, p. 800) said:

I expended further $125 for workers distributing literature and getting the vote out. Also had a list of voters in the various townships made, which I used. I employed about 15 men to work primary day; paid them $5 apiece; two of them $10, who worked before primary day.

Then, on pages 883 and 884 of the record, Myron J. Sherwood said that he employed men to work at the polls on election day; that there were five precincts in the city; he had put men in each of the four precincts, but none in the other. He said, "I paid these men $7 per day."

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. I just want to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question. I understood the Senator to read just now a statement to the effect that this employment was had on election day.

Mr. CARAWAY. For workers on primary day; yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIS. That is a very important point. Were these charges made as to expenditures at the primary or at the election?

Mr. CARAWAY. At the primary.

Mr. WILLIS. At the primary?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIS. Not at the election?

Mr. CARAWAY. At the primary. No question was raised as to the employment of workers on election day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it is not necessary to go into the realm of doubt at all. Upon the undisputed evidence in this case Truman H. Newberry is not entitled to his seat in this body. It is undisputed that with his knowledge, actual and constructive, an army of paid workers were employed who were to go about the State and argue his cause, organizing in his behalf, and inducing everybody whom they could influence to vote for him. I instance, for example, the man who was employed to go about among the Masons; another man who was to go about among fraternal organizations generally; another man who was to go about among the marine workers; and so on, and so on, in addition to the special workers in each county.

At pages 32 and 33 of the brief for Mr. Ford, submitted to the committee, is a condensed reference to the employment of a large number of these workers which I desire to read as an introduction to what I have to say on that branch of the case.

"Our Polish worker," as Mr. King calls him (bill of exceptions, p. 745), Mr. Ramon Glocheski, received $600 salary and $400 expenses for traveling over the State.

Zalile Clago, who worked out the "factory organization" in Detroit, as Mr. King says (record, p. 613), received a salary of $300 per month.

Mr. President, I desire to say that I would not read from this brief had I not verified, by careful examination of the record, every statement made in the summary which I am now reading.

Charles De Land, who handled Jackson County for Mr. Newberry by arrangement with Mr. King (record, pp. 539, 613), received $1,095 for services and some expenses.

Half of it, he declares, being "pure velvet."

Mr. King "arranged" with John Kern to handle the campaign in Midland County (record, p. 619), and Mr. Kern was handed a sealed envelope in the presence of Mr. King, which he afterwards opened on the train and found to contain $400. (Bill of exceptions, p. 133.)

Edward O. McLean, of Ludington, was hired by Mr. King to work for Mr. Newberry at $200 per month, and received $800 in all as salary—and he worked among the marine voters.

He got altogether $500 and $1,200 expenses.

Rolla E. Prescott was hired by Mr. King to work in Alcona and two other counties at $150 a month salary, and received in all $750 salary and about $600 expense money. (Record, p. 537.)

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator just read a statement there that Mr. Newberry employed so-and-so. Can he give me the page of the record? I am very anxious to get that clear.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. King was the one who employed him.

Mr. WILLIS. But just before that the Senator, as I understood him, read that Mr. Newberry employed somebody and paid him $200 a month.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If I said so, I had in mind that Mr. King and the rest of them were Mr. Newberry's agents; but I did not intend to put it that way. I intended to put it that paid workers were employed by this so-called Newberry senatorial committee.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator did not mean to say at all that Mr. Newberry employed anybody?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not personally.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the Senator permit one other question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. Are all of these charges relative to the primary or the election?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. All relative to the primary.

Mr. WILLIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should like to know if it is not a fact that the law of the State of Michigan prohibits these expenditures at primaries?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then I do not gather the distinction which the Senator from Ohio is attempting to make between expenditures at primaries and expenditures at elections.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I do not desire to impose upon the Senator from Montana, but—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I think, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Nevada, that it makes a very great difference whether these expenditures are made at the primary or at the election. That is why I am calling attention to these matters. I am perfectly frank to say to the Senate that if it can be shown here by this record that Mr. Newberry or anybody else with his authority purchased votes at the election, I should never in the world vote to seat him; but the showing that is made here, so far as I have been able to gather from the statements made by those arguing the case, is that all the irregularities charged were at the primary contest for the nomination.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President—

Mr. WILLIS. That nomination subsequently was submitted to the people of Michigan at an election, and no charges at all have been made here on the floor of the Senate or in this record, so far as I have been able to discover—and I have read the record pretty carefully—that go at all to the election. I think it makes a tremendous difference whether these charges are made with reference to the primary or with reference to the election.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Let us for a moment examine the Senator's statement and see where the view of our learned friend from Ohio would lead us. He intimates to the Senator from Montana that it makes some difference to him and to others whether the moneys were expended in the primary or in the election. Does he overlook the fact that large sums of moneys expended in the primary in Michigan were illegally expended? Does he overlook the fact that the rule he implies by his question would mean that in the States which are always Democratic or always Republican a man could buy his seat by spending his barrel of money in the primary, and there would be no practical opposition in the election? In many States the primary is conclusive for all practical purposes. In the State of Vermont and the State of Texas, for instance, the primary determines the election. Under the Senator's philosophy a man could spend $1,000,000 in getting a nomination which inevitably would put him in the Senate, yet he would go free and could not be scourged from the presence of the Senate because, forsooth, he spent the million dollars in the primary and not in the election.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the Senator contend that Michigan is such a strictly partisan State as those which he suggests in the illustration?

Mr. ASHURST. No—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just a moment. The Senator from Michigan told us the other day that no Democrat has ever been elected to this body from the State of Michigan since Lewis Cass was elected, away back in 1845.

Mr. WILLIS. I did not hear that statement, and I do not know about that. But this I do know, that within a very short time a distinguished Democrat has been elected governor of the State of Michigan, and I know that Michigan is debatable ground. I know that the results of the primary were published, that the charges which are made here were published all over the State; I think that is quite a different thing from the situation which would exist if it were shown that bribery was resorted to at the election.

Mr. ASHURST. No, Mr. President—

Mr. WILLIS. Just one other thing. I am waiting for somebody to show the connection of Mr. Newberry with these expenditures, which has not yet been shown. If that can be brought home to him, that is one case; if it is not brought home to him, it is an entirely different case.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator from Montana permit me to answer that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. I am only stating that the philosophy of my learned friend from Ohio would mean that in a State which has never sent a Democratic Senator here—such as Iowa or Vermont—bribery could be practiced at the primary which would be conclusive, but we could not scourge the beneficiary of such bribery from the Senate because forsooth he did not spend the money in the election. Surely that philosophy can not stand the test, because the Senator will perceive at once where it would lead. But his feet are on the untried rock when he says that he is willing—and I believe he would do so—to vote to unseat a man, from whatsoever State he might come, if the illegal expenditure of money could be brought home to him. That is the question in the case. When a candidate orders publicity, when he sits in his office in New York and receives four or five reports weekly, and for a month receives reports by telephone and by telegraph daily, and when he gives orders in writing by the score to his managers to continue publicity, and constantly makes suggestions as to the practical methods and minute details of the campaign, surely he must know that some expenses are connected therewith. When a joint account which he holds with his brother is drawn upon and depleted so that he inquires, "When is this depletion of my account to stop?"

Mr. WILLIS. Does the Senator mean by this reference to contend that these moneys expended for publicity were paid out by Mr. Truman Newberry?

Mr. ASHURST. With his knowledge and consent; yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. And probably out of his own money.

Mr. WILLIS. I should be glad to have the Senator refer me to the page of the record, because I am looking for the truth of this matter. I understand the Senator's statement to be that he contends that this expenditure of some $147,000 for publicity was out of Mr. Truman Newberry's money.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIS. With his knowledge and consent.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to see the place in the record where that is proven.

Mr. ASHURST. If his family, if his brother—

Mr. WILLIS. I am talking about Truman Newberry. He is the man who is under inquiry here.

Mr. ASHURST. If his family, if his friends, if his business associate, if his attorney in fact, could expend this huge sum of money and he not know it, then he is too much of a babe in the woods to sit in the Senate. The Senator from Missouri—

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator did not give me the page of the record.

Mr. ASHURST. All right; let the Senator turn to page 703 of the bill of exceptions.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am quite willing that the discussion should go to the question addressed by the Senator from Ohio as to whether it is important that the wrongdoing should have occurred in the primary or in the general election, but I shall object to any further discussion of the question about whether Mr. Newberry furnished the money or not. That is not the question.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If anybody desires to submit anything on the question addressed to me by the Senator from Ohio, I shall be very glad to yield for that purpose; but, Mr. President, I have not prepared myself to discuss that question before the Senate. To my mind it does not make a bit of difference whether Truman Newberry went out and openly violated the law to get the Republican nomination for the Senate or whether he went out and openly violated the law to get elected after he was nominated. If he violated the law to get the nomination, the penalty ought to be visited upon him just exactly the same, and the Chief Justice in his opinion adverts to the same state of facts mentioned by the Senator from Arizona that in many States the nomination is practically equivalent to an election, and history discloses that, so far as the United States Senate is concerned, that is the case in the State of Michigan. A nomination for the Senate upon the Republican ticket in the State of Michigan is practically a title to a seat in this body.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. With the permission of the Senator from Montana I want to ask the attention of the junior Senator from Missouri, and I read from his report, the majority report:

The amount of money spent at the primary was large—too large. * * * Your committee condemns the use of such a large sum of money in any primary campaign.

This is not the minority insinuating; this is what the majority says:

Your committee condemns the use of such a large sum of money in any primary campaign.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator be good enough to finish the sentence?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not any more of it to read; that is all I want to read. The Senator may finish it.

Mr. SPENCER. If that were all—

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, I am not going to take part in any controversy with the Senator from Missouri or anybody else when he frames my question. I frame my own question. He can answer it as he sees fit. I am not going to take part in any controversy where the opposition can frame my question. I have quoted his statement accurately. Now I ask, Whom does he condemn for the expenditure of this money?

Mr. SPENCER. May I have the privilege of answering the Senator?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. The sentence which the Senator from Arizona did not complete when he saw fit to read from the majority report I will finish; not the next paragraph but the sentence which the Senator from Arizona offered incomplete. The sentence reads:

The amount of money spent at the primary was large—too large—but there was no concealment whatever with regard to it, and it was spent entirely for legal and proper purposes.

Mr. ASHURST. Then why do you condemn it?

Mr. SPENCER. More than that—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I object to a further continuance of this colloquy.

Mr. SPENCER. Does not the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I object.

Mr. SPENCER. More than that, the majority report shows beyond peradventure that not one dollar of that ever came from Truman H. Newberry or was ever solicited by him.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I object. I objected a while ago to the discussion going into that question.

Mr. SPENCER. I was sure I would not be allowed to answer.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I want to interject one suggestion here which I hope both sides will bear in mind while they are discussing this case. I want to know whether this body proposes to lay down the rule that a man who selects a political committee is not responsible for whatever that committee does. If the Senate proposes to say that a man can select a political committee and then not be responsible for that committee, the door is open so wide for corruption that it never can be closed again.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President—

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, if I had permission to reply—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I want to ask the Senator from Idaho if he does not know, as has been iterated and reiterated here at least a hundred times, that Mr. Newberry knew nothing about the committee, nothing at all; so how could he be responsible for what the committee did?

Mr. BORAH. The evidence in the record that Mr. Newberry selected this committee is so plain that if the same evidence were submitted to a jury in a case involving a question of crime, they would convict a man of the crime charged.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Idaho is entirely mistaken, in the face of the record. Mr. Newberry said to Mr. Templeton, "If I run, I hope my campaign will be managed by a committee of business men." The Senator can not point his finger to a place in the record as to the selection of a single man by Mr. Newberry. He can draw an inference or work out a suspicion to sustain the judgment which he has made up long ago, but he can never do it by the record.

Mr. BORAH. When the Senator says that the Senator from Idaho is sustaining a judgment which he made up long ago, he is stating that which he does not know to be true, which is the same thing as stating that which he knows to be untrue. I did not make up my mind long ago.

Mr. SPENCER. I hope that is true; I hope the Senator has not made up his mind.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator did not permit me to complete the sentence. I started to say that I did not make up my mind long ago. But when the Senator stated here upon the floor that the Senator from Michigan did not select this committee, I made it my business to go through both reports and through the record, and before the debate closes I will submit the uncontroverted evidence of the fact that he did select it, and not only that he selected it but that he kept in close touch with it until the committee closed its business. The evidence upon both these propositions seems to me most conclusive. I have examined the entire record anew on these questions since the debate opened.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I merely desire to add to the Senator from Ohio, in explanation of the statement I made, that I have given no attention whatever to the question as to whether there is any difference at all, so far as the right of Mr. Newberry to occupy a seat in this body is concerned, whether the things charged against him were done at the primary or at the general election, and I made no investigation of that subject at all, because even the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections do not suggest such a difference.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator contends that there is no difference?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no difference.

Mr. WILLIS. I quite disagree with the Senator on that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am calling attention to the fact that I did not go into that particular legal proposition, because it is not even suggested by any member of the majority who report in favor of seating Mr. Newberry. In other words, it is a proposition that seemed to them so perfectly plain that they did not even advance that in support of the contention they make that he ought to be seated.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Merely a question, put in the best of humor and good faith. I ask the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Idaho whether there is any principle of law which imputes to them or to me, or to anyone else, the illegal practices which may be followed by a committee chosen to do things which are legal?

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Idaho to answer that.

Mr. BORAH. My attention was distracted for the moment, and I did not hear the first part of the Senator's question.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The question is this: The whole debate now is hinging around the question of imputing knowledge to Truman Newberry of what his committee is alleged to have done illegally. I ask the Senator from Idaho, with the consent of the Senator from Montana, whether or not, when he chooses a campaign committee to do legal things and it does things that are illegal, the knowledge of what it does can be imputed to him?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I take the position that it is as old as the common law, iterated and reiterated again and again, that in political matters, when a man chooses a political committee to carry on his campaign, the committee's knowledge is his knowledge and that he is responsible for whatever the committee does. If the committee corrupts the election, it is his corruption, and there is no way he can escape from that proposition so long as he permits the committee to act for him. He might repudiate his committee but he can not allow his committee to continue, take the fruits of its efforts, and not be responsible for whatever it does in the way of securing his nomination or election.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. On the contrary, Mr. President, I state the law, as I understand it, that in civil matters responsibility can be imputed, but a crime must be proved.

Mr. BORAH. There is where the Senator makes a mistake. We are not trying Mr. Newberry for a crime. We are investigating the question of whether or not there was corruption of an election; whether the election was controlled by money. It would not make any difference if there was no statute whatever making it a crime. That is not the question here. That is the question which was tried in court. Here the public interest is the dominant question involved, the question of purity of an election, and if it was impure and corrupt no man can take advantage of that election in the way of enjoying the fruits of its corruption.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will permit me, I wish the attention of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] a moment. Mr. Newberry not only indorses what Mr. Paul King did but he thanks him in the following letter:

AUGUST 26, 1918.

MY DEAR PAUL: While to-morrow's primary vote will record the result of your efforts, please know that every day I live will be a reminder of this obligation and debt to you, which I can never repay except when some fortunate hour arrives when I may reciprocate in actions instead of words, this sense of real and deep thankfulness that I have such friends as you and the other gentlemen associated with you on your committee.

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY.

He is indorsing all that King did, and he never complained of any of it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, we are getting diverted from the question, but for the information of the Senator from Georgia I read some excerpts to which I called the attention of the Senate on Saturday. I read from page 548 of Hodgkins's Election Cases for the Province of Ontario, as follows:

The law of agency as regards parliamentary elections is not the ordinary law of agency, but a special law. The usual rule is that where an agent acts contrary to his instructions the principal is not bound; but in parliamentary agency it is different, for there the principal is liable for all acts of the agent whatsoever, even though they be done contrary to his express instructions.

At page 665 it was said:

I do not doubt that if a candidate, who has appointed no agents, is made aware that some of his supporters are systematically working for him, and by any act (or perhaps even by forbearance to interpose) can be fairly deemed to recognize and adopt their proceedings in order to further his election, he makes them his agents and must take the consequences. A contrary rule would encourage fraud and corruption and facilitate evasions of the law.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is the opinion of a man who may or may not be a lawyer, but the Senator well knows that that law or pretended law could be used by a man's enemies to oust him from a perfectly honest election and he could not help himself.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He may or may not be a lawyer, I can not say as to that, but he is the chief justice of one of the courts of the Province of Ontario.

I continue reading from this list of paid workers:

William M. Connolly received $600 for salary and $600 for expenses for working in Ottawa County. (R., 509.)

Terry Corliss was hired by Mr. King at $75 per month and worked 21 weeks organizing different counties for Mr. Newberry. He was not authorized to pay any of the county chairmen or secretaries he appointed any money; this was done by Mr. King personally. (R., 604.)

J. B. Burns, an insurance man of the town of Three Rivers, was hired by J. R. Davis, a Newberry field man, to work for Mr. Newberry and received $300 salary and $100 for expenses. (R., 653.)

Fay Donning, of Lansing, received $500 as salary and $300 for expenses—"Spend his time for Newberry" in Lansing. (R., 605.)

George W. John, of Mount Clemens, was paid $450 and paid out $187 for some expenses. (R., 881.)

William E. Rice received $50 a month for working among the Spanish-American War veterans. (R., 874.)

Edward Fehling, of St. Johns, was hired by Charles Floyd to work for Mr. Newberry and received $470 for his services. (R., 506.)

Charles Tufts, of Scottville, Mich., was hired by Paul King and Charles Floyd in March, 1918, "to work" for Mr. Newberry at $200 a month and expense money. He worked for five months, and says:

"That in accordance with plans made in my conversation with King I worked the following counties: Mason, Newaygo, Iosco, Alpena, Cheboygan, Presque Isle, Grand Traverse, Manistee, Lake, and Montmorency. That I went to see the county officers in each of the above-mentioned counties, and if they were not lined up with anyone, tried to get them to work for Mr. Newberry. * * * That E. O. McLean, of Ludington, Mich., a newspaper man, was employed by the Newberry organization to line up the marines, fishermen, life savers, etc., and write a number of articles in favor of Newberry for his publication; that McLean and I traveled the coast towns together for the purpose of lining up the vote and talked Newberry to the men we met. * * * That my expenses in doing my work in behalf of Mr. Newberry were heavy at times, for when I would run into a place where things were right I would buy meals, cigars, etc., for parties of men, and, in accordance with my agreement with King, I was not limited in my expense, and I spent freely, but can not determine definitely the amount actually expended by me, but would judge it to be in the neighborhood of $600."

By section 2 of the public acts, 1913, of Michigan, it is provided:

Every political committee shall appoint a treasurer, who shall receive, keep, and disburse all sums of money which may be collected or received by such committee or by any of its members for collection expenses; and unless such treasurer is first appointed, it shall be unlawful for a political committee or any of its members to collect, receive, or disburse money for any such purpose.

SEC. 3. No candidate and no treasurer of any political committee shall pay, give, or lend, or agree to pay, give, or lend, either directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing for any nomination or election expense whatever, except for the following purposes:

First. For traveling expenses and personal expenses incident thereto; for printing, stationery, advertising, postage, expressage, freight, telegraph, telephone, and public-messenger service.

Second. For dissemination of printed information to the public.

Third. For political meetings, demonstrations, and conventions.

Fourth. For the rent, maintenance, and furnishing of offices.

Fifth. For the payment of clerks, typewriters, stenographers, janitors, and messengers actually employed.

Sixth. For the employment of challengers at primaries and elections, to the number allowed by law as such.

Seventh. For the payment of public speakers and musicians at public meetings and their necessary traveling expenses.

Eighth. For copying and classifying of election registers or poll lists and investigating the right to vote of the persons listed or registered therein, and conducting proceedings to purge the registers and lists and prevent improper or unlawful registration or voting.

Ninth. For making canvasses of voters.

Tenth. For conveying infirm or disabled voters to and from the polls.

Eleventh. For employing as counsel attorneys licensed to practice in accordance with the laws of the State and for the necessary expenses of such counsel.

None of the provisions of this act shall be construed as relating to the rendering of services by speakers, writers, publishers, or others, for which no compensation is asked or given.

Mr. President, I defy anyone to find in this list of 11 different classes of expenditures authorized under the law of Michigan any justification whatever for the employment of this army of paid workers to which I have called attention. The esteemed Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], however, suggested that justification could be found in the ninth class of expenditures warranted, namely, for making canvasses of voters. No member of the majority committee had the hardihood to make any such contention as that.

It never occurred to the learned and erudite Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] who has argued the case of Mr. Newberry in the Senate that it could be justified under that. Mr. Newberry was represented before the committee by astute and able counsel who exhausted every means at their command in justification of his contention, and they never thought that this would justify any of the expenditures challenged here at all. It remained for the Senator from Georgia to discover this loophole.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I remember that in the leading case, the Dartmouth case, the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall was based upon a minor point which was never argued by Daniel Webster.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, I do not mean to say that it is not possible that a point overlooked by the able counsel for Mr. Newberry, by the distinguished jurists who made the majority report and who argued the case upon the floor of the Senate, might not have been discovered by the Senator from Georgia. I submit that the probabilities are, however, that an idea thus occurring to him in the course of the discussion is open to further investigation.

I am reminded of a story told to me in my youth by Gen. Albert S. Bragg, who for many years represented our district in Congress. He was the author, as all Senators will recall, of the expression that Cleveland was loved for the enemies he had made. He told me that in his youth he practiced law before Timothy O. Howe, afterwards a Member of this body, and a judge of one of the courts of the State of Wisconsin; and Bragg, with the caustic sarcasm of which he was master, said that the way to practice law successfully before Judge Howe was never to expose to him the particularly strong point in your case, but to travel along so closely to it that he could not fail to appreciate the point, and that would give him an opportunity to say that a matter which apparently had been overlooked by counsel seemed to him of special importance, and he would proceed to elucidate that and decide the case accordingly. So it would appear that in this particular case a point overlooked by the able counsel has been discovered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. President, there is not any question of doubt as to what is meant by making a canvass of voters. Whenever a bill is approaching its final determination in this body it is quite a common thing for some one to make a canvass of the Senate to find out how many are going to be for it and how many votes are going to be against it. That is the usual custom; that is making a canvass of the Senate. We ask, Has a canvass of the Senate yet been made? The making of a canvass of voters means the employment of a man to go about and make a list of those who are going to vote, in this particular case, against Newberry and those who are going to vote for him. That is what that means; in other words, it is a purely mechanical employment. That is the dictionary definition of canvass.

I read from the Century Dictionary as follows:

Canvass. 1. Examination; close inspection; scrutiny; as a canvass of votes.

That is to say, after an election a canvass of votes is made. That is to say, the votes are counted up for the various candidates.

Specifically. 2. An examination or scrutiny of a body of men, in order to ascertain their opinions or their intentions, especially whether they will vote for or against a given measure or a candidate; an estimate of the number of votes cast or to be cast for or against a candidate or bill; as a canvass of the legislature disclosed a majority of six in favor of the measure.

Another definition is:

3. A seeking solicitation; specifically, systematic solicitation for the votes and support of a district or of individuals by a candidate for office or by his friends.

Mr. President, the particular character of people who may be employed in a campaign is set out in subdivisions 5, 6, and 7 of section 3, Michigan public act 109, as follows:

Fifth. For the payment of clerks, typewriters, stenographers, janitors, and messengers actually employed.

Sixth. For the employment of challengers at primaries and elections to the number allowed by law as such.

Seventh. For the payment of public speakers and musicians at public meetings and their necessary traveling expenses.

"Public meetings"—not the employment of speakers to go around privately and solicit voters or argue with voters, but at "public meetings." Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. They are forbidden to be hired for the purpose of going around privately to talk to voters, to endeavor to induce them to vote for the candidate. Now, we go on:

Eighth. For copying and classifying of election registers or poll lists and investigating the right to vote of the persons listed or registered therein, and conducting proceedings to purge the registers and lists and prevent improper or unlawful registration or voting.

You will observe that in every case, except in case of the seventh subdivision where the work can be done openly at public meetings, it relates not to men who are to exercise any influence at all, but to those who are to perform merely mechanical tasks, such as stenographers, janitors, canvassers of voters, and so on.

Let us direct our attention to the law, and let us ascertain what the law is with reference to the employment of workers of this character. The whole thing is disposed of by the decision of the case of Eads against Stifel, reported in Two hundred and four Missouri, page 420. Before I pass to that, Mr. President, I want to say, however, that the Legislature of the State of Michigan, not content with enumerating the classes of expenditures which may be made in a campaign, went on specifically and denounced the employment of workers, such as the evidence shows were employed in such great numbers in this campaign. Section 45 of act 281 of the Michigan public acts reads as follows—and I now read the act as quoted in the brief of the attorney for Mr. Newberry—

SEC. 45. Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives, lends, or agrees to give or lend, or offers, or promises any money or valuable consideration, or promises, or endeavors to procure any money or valuable consideration or office, place, or employment, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any person in order to induce or have such person induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting for, or support or oppose any candidate, or on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any primary election in this State; every person who by any means receives, agrees, or contracts for any money, gift, fee, loan, or valuable consideration, office place, appointment, or employment for himself or any other person, for voting or agreeing to vote, or for refraining or agreeing to refrain from voting in a particular manner at any such primary election; or for inducing, or undertaking to induce any other person to vote in a particular manner, or to do or perform any of the acts or things forbidden by this act, or on account of doing or agreeing to do, or having done campaign work, electioneering, soliciting votes for such candidates on primary day or prior thereto, or who after any primary election in this State, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives or receives any money or valuable consideration or place, position, or employment on account of any person having voted or refrained from voting, or having induced any other person to vote or refrain from voting at any such primary election; or having induced or undertaken to induce any other person to vote in a particular manner or for any particular candidate at any such primary election, or on account of any person having done or been a party to doing anything forbidden by this act, it being the intent of this clause to prohibit the prevailing practice of candidates hiring with money and promises of positions, etc., workers on primary day and prior thereto; also every person who in behalf of any firm, partnership, association, or corporation, gives, lends, or receives, or agrees to give, lend, or receive, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, place, position, or employment, or promises or endeavors to procure any money or valuable consideration in order to aid or promote the nomination of any particular candidate, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment for a period of not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court."

Mr. President, what is the contention on behalf of Mr. Newberry with respect to this statute? The brief says:

This section, it will be observed, entirely refers to the bribery of voters, has always been so understood and construed.

That, I understand, is the contention of the Senator from Missouri, that it refers exclusively to the bribery of voters. Let us see if it does. Mr. President, in at least three separate places in this statute the employment of paid workers is plainly condemned. It says:

SEC. 45. Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives, lends, or agrees to give or lend, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, or promises or endeavors to procure any money or valuable consideration or office, place, or employment—

That is the consideration feature of it—any person who does this—to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any person in order to induce or have such person induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting for—

Then it says—

or support or oppose any candidate—

That is to say, any person who gives money to a man to get him to go out to induce any voter to support or oppose any candidate is guilty of a misdemeanor—or on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any primary election in this State.

That is the end of that part of it. So, Mr. President, it is clearly a crime under the statute for anybody to give money to another upon consideration that he is to go out to induce anybody to support or oppose any candidate for an election. Observe the words "to induce." What were these men employed for except to go about the State and induce, if they could, people to vote for Mr. Newberry—every person who by any means receives, agrees, or contracts for any money, gift, fee, loan, or valuable consideration, office, place, appointment or employment, for himself or any other person, for voting or agreeing to vote, or for refraining or agreeing to refrain from voting in a particular manner at any such primary election, or for inducing or undertaking to induce any other person to vote in a particular manner, or to do or perform any of the acts or things forbidden by this act, or on account of agreeing to do, or having done any campaign work, electioneering, soliciting votes for such candidate on primary day or prior thereto.

I will ask the attention of the Senator from Missouri, if he will have the kindness to follow me—

Every person who by any means receives, agrees, or contracts for any money, gift, fee, loan, or other valuable consideration, * * * to do or perform any of the acts or things forbidden by this act, or on account of doing or agreeing to do, or having done campaign work, electioneering, soliciting votes for such candidates on primary day or prior thereto—

Is there any corruption contemplated there in the view of the Senator?

Mr. SPENCER. Is the Senator asking me a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. SPENCER. There is corruption contemplated there; the Senator has read the section or a part of it; but I ask him in all candor, inasmuch as that section has been on the statute books in Michigan for many years, if the construction of the Senator is right; if it means that the man who hires another to go around and get voters to go to the polls is a criminal or that the man who receives the hire is a criminal—a thing that is done and always has been done at every election—if the Senator's construction is right, is it not passing strange, as the Senator from Georgia intimated this morning, that at no time in the history of the State of Michigan, either in this case, where the feeling was at its highest, or in any other, has there been on the part of a single prosecuting officer in the State of Michigan any attempt to give to that statute the construction which the Senator now seeks to give it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not giving it any construction at all; I was just reading the statute; and I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri another question.

Mr. SPENCER. Let me first finish the answer to the Senator's question. I say that by any fair construction the statute read in its entirety refers to the illegal influencing, the improper influencing of a voter for hire, to corruption or bribery or fraud; that it never has been in Michigan and is not now a crime in good faith to hire a man or for a man to accept the hire to canvass voters, to find out how many have not voted, to see that they go to the polls, to advance in what is thus a legitimate manner the cause of the candidate in whom he may be interested.

While I am on my feet, I may say to the Senator that he has in his hand and has just referred to a case in my own State, the case of Eads against Stifel. He had hardly completed the sentence that under the statute of Michigan it was entirely proper to hire men as canvassers, and then he saw fit to go to the dictionary and read the interpretation of a canvasser; but if he will read the Missouri case from which he quotes, he will find that in that Missouri case there was a reference to the prior case in twenty-third Missouri of Keating against Hyde, where it was stated that the employment of a canvasser was in common law and under the statutes of Missouri illegal so far as the enforcement of any contract for expenditures in connection with the matter was concerned. The court seems to have an entirely different view from the Senator from Montana as to what is meant by a canvasser, and yet the Senator from Montana admits that under the Michigan law canvassers are expressly allowed to be hired without limit as to the amount of money used for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is getting away from the question I addressed to him.

Mr. SPENCER. I thought I would answer the other question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We will talk about the Missouri case directly, when I get to it. I am going to ask the Senator this question:

An indictment charges, we will say, Paul King and others associated with him with having agreed for a valuable consideration with John Kern to electioneer and do campaign work for Truman H. Newberry, a candidate at the primaries. Would a crime be charged under this statute if it were averred in the indictment that Paul H. King and others agreed for money with John Kern to do electioneering and campaign work for Truman H. Newberry?

Mr. SPENCER. It depends entirely upon the intentment of the indictment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Never mind about the indictment. I told the Senator what the indictment charged.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator will make the illustration a fair one, and say "electioneering or campaign work without bribery, corruption, or fraud," I say it would not stand a moment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am using the very language of the statute—on account of electioneering and having done campaign work.

Mr. SPENCER. Exactly; and I am saying that if the Senator will take that language of the statute free from corruption or bribery or fraud, answer the Senator, the indictment will not stand.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So the Senator means that this statute should read that one who employs another to do campaign work and electioneering by corrupt means shall be guilty.

Mr. SPENCER. Not that it should read "alone," but that that is the fair intendment of the statute; and if I am wrong and the Senator is right, it is a strange thing that in all the history of that statute, with the multitude of elections in Michigan, the contention of the Senator from Montana has never once been either sustained or brought up.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator wants to interpret this as though it read: "For having done campaign work or electioneering by corrupt means." Unfortunately, however, the statute does not say so.

Mr. President, lest there should be any doubt about the thing at all, the statute says:

It being the intent of this clause to prohibit the prevailing practice of candidates hiring with money and promises of positions, etc., workers on primary day and prior thereto.

I suppose the Senator wants us to incorporate in there "workers who work by corrupt means."

Mr. SPENCER. It is incorporated there, not in language, but in the interpretation which has been given to that statute since it was enacted in Michigan.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. By whom?

Mr. SPENCER. By any court to which it has ever been presented.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What court?

Mr. SPENCER. There has been election after election. That has happened a thousand times. If the Senator is right, there would have been a court and a complaint and a trial, but the Senator is wrong in his interpretation.

May I say to the Senator, in common fairness and justice, what is the Senator—with a brutality, as it seems to me, that is indescribable—trying to do? The Senator is trying to brand with disgrace the name of a man and unseat him from this body because of a difference of construction of the technical operation of a law. It is inconceivable.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No, Mr. President; I propose to show, by a decision from the State of the Senator, that his construction of this statute is entirely unjustified, and that this statute, as well as the similar statute of his own State, condemns the hiring of workers, whether they are to do anything corrupt or not. That is the decision in Eads against Stifel. I might add that the statute in a further section makes penal anything done by anyone else which is forbidden to be done by the candidate; so that this statute must be regarded as condemning the hiring of paid workers, either by a candidate or by anyone else.

Now, let us see.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. Under the contention of the Senator from Missouri, could any character of misrepresentation, or any character of solicitation, or any amount of bogus boosting, or the prostitution and subsidizing of the press, or the flooding of the country with any character of misinformation as to the quality and character of a candidate, be punished if he abstained from the crude buying of a voter to deliver a ballot or to stamp a ballot on election day?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand that to be the position of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. President, let us see whether this employment of paid workers must or must not carry with it the understanding that the worker is to work corruptly. I read from the opinion in the case to which I have adverted:

Reynolds, P. J.: This is an action by plaintiff against defendant, the petition in two counts. In the first count it is averred that on or about February 1, 1912, a certain agreement was made and entered into by and between plaintiff and defendant to the following effect:

"Plaintiff was employed to devote his time and services to promoting the candidacy of Mr. William H. Taft for nomination as President of the United States (and of Mr. Otto F. Stifel for national committeeman for Missouri), in the various congressional districts of Missouri, and for said time and services was to receive $100 per week and the actual expenses incurred by him in carrying out the objects of his said employment."

He was not to do anything corrupt at all. He was to go about the State of Missouri and urge and advocate the nomination of William H. Taft as the Republican candidate for President, and the selection of Mr. Stifel as the national committeeman.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. A perfectly honorable thing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. An entirely legitimate contract, if it were not against public policy; but the point I am making is that this man was not to do anything in the way of bribery or corruption of voters at all.

Plaintiff states that he has duly performed all the conditions of the contract on his part to be performed, and rendered the services contracted to be performed as aforesaid, whereby the sum of $1,400 is due him from defendant for salary for such services; that defendant has paid him the expenses incurred in pursuance of the terms of the contract, and on April 24 paid him the sum of $100 and on June 16, 1912, the further sum of $50, leaving a balance due of $1,250 for salary. Averring demand and failure and refusal to pay, plaintiff asks judgment for that amount.

The second count is on the same transaction but on quantum meruit. The words in brackets were stricken out of both counts on motion.

A general denial was filed and the cause tried before a jury. At the close of plaintiff's evidence the court gave a peremptory instruction for defendant. Verdict and judgment went accordingly, from which latter plaintiff, filing a notice for new trial, has duly appealed.

The contract, as testified to by plaintiff, was to the effect that defendant said he would pay plaintiff $100 a week and his expenses, if he would go out and undertake the work such as he had laid out for him to do in this State—that is, use his personal influence in procuring delegates to the national convention favorable to Mr. Taft—that plaintiff's acquaintance with every one of the districts, with the different chairmen, was just what he wanted and he wanted plaintiff to interest himself in the campaign, and plaintiff consented and told defendant he would go out and enter the work for a short time.

You will observe that that is practically the same kind of employment as was the case in each one of these instances to which the attention of the Senate has been called.

On cross-examination plaintiff testified that the purpose for which Mr. Stifel employed him was to go around in the several counties where the counties were holding county conventions to elect delegates to the congressional and State conventions to see, or use his influence to see, that Taft delegates were elected in those counties and that ultimately the delegates sent to the convention would be for Taft. That was the ultimate result of his duty of going into each of the counties and getting men to work. Plaintiff testified that his long experience in politics in this State had given him an acquaintance throughout the State; that, as he stated in his petition, his expenses had been paid. Plaintiff also testified that in connection with this work he had looked after the interest of defendant in securing delegates who would vote for him as national committeeman. Plaintiff testified at great length as to his acquaintance throughout the State and as to his services rendered under this contract; that he went into different parts of the State, saw different men who were prominent and active in politics, and endeavored—used his acquaintance and influence—to secure delegates to the convention who were in favor of the nomination of Mr. Taft for President of the United States. Under cross-examination plaintiff was asked this question: "Mr. Stifel never asked you, then, for what consideration you would undertake this work, did he?" To which he answered, "I don't think so, for the reason I didn't want to undertake the work, but he said he would give $100 if I would do that." Plaintiff was then asked, "What work?" To which he answered, "Such work as he wanted me to undertake to do in the campaign, to go into the different counties, wherever he asked me to go and to work; first, to secure delegates for Taft and at the same time to secure influence for Mr. Stifel" for national committeeman. Plaintiff further testified that when he went into a district he would go to people whom he thought approachable and try to interest them in the candidacy of Mr. Taft; that he would ascertain who were likely to be delegates from the county conventions and whether they were for Taft; and if not, take such steps as he could to induce them to be for him; that was generally his line of work.

He was not going around bribing and corrupting any of these voters. He was just using his influence with them, arguing with them, endeavoring to persuade them to support Mr. Taft for the nomination. I read further:

Asked what part of his services in the case were rendered for contests which he had assisted in conducting before the national committee, and what part was outside of that, he said that the services were so mingled together that he could not make a difference in charge or value of the services under the several accounts. It may be said here that the evidence showed that there were contests instituted before the national committee and plaintiff, with another lawyer, was engaged to attend to them, for which he was paid by the national committee; but his testimony was that included in those services was his employment by the defendant, for which he was charging.

Plaintiff produced a witness who testified that he had some correspondence with defendant, to whom he had written about the condition of political affairs in his county, and in reply defendant wrote that he had plaintiff hired and that he (plaintiff) would be in the county if he could get there; that plaintiff would come on and help in the campaign in his county.

Beyond testimony of a lawyer as to having been employed by plaintiff to institute this action, but who had thrown up the employment, which testimony was introduced for the purpose of showing why action had been delayed, the petition having been filed January 31, 1917, this was all the testimony in the case.

Without setting out the evidence in detail it is sufficient to say that the substance of plaintiff's own testimony is that he was hired to use his influence to secure delegates favorable to the candidate supported by defendant.

Again, I repeat, there is not an element of corruption in it, not a suggestion that he was to bribe any voter, not a contention that bribery or corruption was involved in that controversy at all. The court said:

Our court, in Keating v. Hyde (23 Mo. App., 555), held that a promise to pay for services rendered by another as a canvasser at a primary election to secure the promisor's nomination for an office was unlawful and void. In that case, at page 559, the court quotes section 1474, Revised Statutes, 1879, which is as follows:

"If any person shall, directly or indirectly, give or procure to be given, or engage to give any money, gift, or reward, or any office, place, or employment upon any engagement, contract, or agreement, that the person to whom or to whose use, or on whose behalf, such gift or promise shall be made, shall by himself or any other procure or endeavor to procure the election of any person to any office, at any election by the electors, or any public body, under the constitution or laws of this State, the person so offending shall on conviction be adjudged guilty of bribery and punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding five years."

That was the statute to which the court appealed, and it held that by virtue of that statute the contract under consideration there, bribery and corruption not being a feature of it at all, was in violation of that statute, a penal statute, and therefore void. That is section 3722, Revised Statutes 1889, and I may say that you can not distinguish that statute from the statute of the State of Michigan to which I have just called the attention of the Senate.

The court say further:

This is section 3722, Revised Statutes 1889; section 2090, Revised Statutes 1899; and section 4401, Revised Statutes 1909.

Our court said, in Keating v. Hyde, supra, that this section had been in force since the revision of 1855, and that it is sufficient for the conclusion of our court, since it clearly indicates the policy of the State. The conclusion of our court in the Keating case was that the agreement was void as against public policy. That decision has been cited approvingly by law writers, as see notes to Exchange National Bank of Fitzgerald v. Henderson (139 Ga., 260, in 51 L. R. A. (N. S.), 551), and is amply supported by the decisions of courts of other States. These cases are so fully cited in the notes in 51 L. R. A., supra, and there commented upon that we do not think it necessary to reproduce them here. Among the cases sustaining this is Trist v. Child (21 Wall., 441), where the principle is recognized, and it was there held that a contract to take charge of a claim before Congress by personal solicitation by the agent and others supposed to have personal influence in any way with Members of Congress to procure the passage of a bill—lobbying for its passage—was void.

So they held that that contract was void and that no recovery could be had upon it because it was contrary to that penal statute of the State of Missouri, and it necessarily follows that if either of the parties to that contract was charged with a violation of that statute he would be held guilty under the laws of the State of Missouri.

Under those circumstances how can the Senator say that corruption or bribery is a necessary incident of a contract of that character in order to bring them under the condemnation of the statute?

But the Senator says, "Oh, that is a civil case, and this one before us is a criminal case." What is the difference whether this is a civil case or a criminal case? The court holds that the contract is in violation of that criminal statute and therefore is void, holding, necessarily, as I said, that if either of the parties was charged under that statute with having made this contract he would be subject to conviction.

Mr. President, the suggestion that that is a civil case, and that this one before us is in the nature of a criminal case, in some other place I might designate as scarcely to be dignified by the characterization that it was pettifoggery.

There is nothing extraordinary about this. That decision simply conforms to the common law. That statute of the State of Missouri is nothing more than an expression of the common law upon this subject.

Before I enter upon that, though, I want to say a word about the contention that this is in the nature of a criminal proceeding.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will not the Senator read so much of the common law as holds that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I will do that directly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Anything the Senator may read to that effect will be in contradiction of the Supreme Court decision.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am quite sure the Senator is in error about that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Possibly so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, this is not a criminal proceeding by any means, nor do any of the rules peculiar in character applicable to criminal proceedings have any place in this controversy.

In one of the reports filed in the Lorimer case attention was called to that aspect. I read as follows:

In election cases before the Senate a mistake is frequently made in drawing a comparison between such a trial and a criminal trial in court. Analogies are frequently misleading, and an analogy between the trial of an election case by the Senate and a criminal case is most misleading. The comparison, if drawn, should be between the trial of a Senate election case and a civil case before a court.

Thus much for the suggestion that the Missouri case is a civil case and applies the rule applicable to civil trials.

The statement thus made in the minority report is supported by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Ames v. Kansas (111 U. S., 459). Election contests are not criminal in their character, no matter how bitterly the right of the party to the office is challenged.

I read from the body of the opinion in the Ames case, at page 459:

In Kansas the writ of quo warranto and the proceeding by information in the nature of quo warranto have been abolished, and the remedies which were obtainable at common law in those forms are had by civil action. (Dassler's Comp. Laws, sec. 4192; code, sec. 652.) Such an action may be brought in the Supreme Court when "any person shall usurp, intrude into, or unlawfully hold or exercise any public office, or shall claim any franchise within this State, or any office in any corporation created by authority of this State," or "when any association or number of persons shall act within this State as a corporation without being legally incorporated," or when any corporation do or admit [omit] acts which amount to a surrender or a forfeiture of their rights as a corporation, or when any corporation abuses its power, or exercises powers not conferred by law. (Id., sec. 4193; code, sec. 653.)

By the Code of Civil Procedure (id., sec. 3525; code, sec. 4) "an action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which a party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense." (Sec. 3527; code, sec. 6.) "Actions are of two kinds—first, civil; second, criminal." (Sec. 3528; code, sec. 7.) "A criminal action is one prosecuted by the State as a party, against a person charged with a public offense, for the punishment thereof." (Sec. 3529; code, sec. 8.) "Every other action is a civil action." (Sec. 3531; code, sec. 10.) "The distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, and the forms of all such actions and suits, heretofore existing, are abolished; and in their place there shall be hereafter but one form of action, which shall be known as a civil action."

The original common-law writ of quo warranto was a civil writ, at the suit of the Crown, and not a criminal prosecution. (Rex v. Marsden, 3 Burr., 1812, 1817.) It was in the nature of a writ of right by the King against one who usurped or claimed franchises or liberties, to inquire by what right he claimed them (Com. Dig. Quo Warranto A), and the first process was summons. (Id., C. 2.) This writ, however, fell into disuse in England centuries ago, and its place was supplied by an information in the nature of a quo warranto which in its origin was "a criminal method of prosecution as well to punish the usurper by a fine for the usurpation of the franchise as to oust him or seize it for the Crown." (3 Bl. Com., 263.) Long before our revolution, however, it lost its character as a criminal proceeding in everything except form, and was "applied to the mere purposes of trying the civil right, seizing the franchise, or ousting the wrongful possessor, the fine being nominal only." (3 Bl. Com., supra; The King v. Francis, 2 T. R., 484; Bac. Ab. Tit. Information D; 2 Kyd on Corp., 439.) And such, without any special legislation to that effect, has always been its character in many of the States of the Union. (Commonwealth v. Browne, 1 S. & R., 385; People v. Richardson, 4 Cow., 102, note; State v. Hardie, 1 Iredell Law, 42, 48; State Bank v. State, 1 Blackf., 267, 272; State v. Lingo, 26 Mo., 496, 498.) In some of the States, however, it has been treated as criminal in form, and matters of pleading and jurisdiction governed accordingly. Such is the rule in New York, Wisconsin, New Jersey, Arkansas, and Illinois, but in all these States it is used as a civil remedy only. (Attorney General v. Utica Insurance Co., 2 Johns., ch. 370, 377; People v. Jones, 18 Wend., 601; State v. West Wisconsin Railway Co., 34 Wis., 197, 213; State v. Ashley, 1 Ark., 279; State v. Roe, 2 Dutcher, 215, 217.) This being the condition of the law, it seems to us clear that the effect of legislation like that in Kansas, as to the mode of proceeding in quo warranto cases, is to relieve the old civil remedy of the burden of the criminal form of proceeding with which it had become encumbered, and to restore it to its original position as a civil action for the enforcement of a civil right. The right and the remedy are thus brought into harmony, and parties are not driven to the necessity of using the form of a criminal action to determine a civil right. This has been the construction put upon similar laws in other States.

So it is universally held that an election contest is a civil proceeding, not a criminal proceeding.

Now I proceed to the consideration of the common law. It is expressed in a note in 51 L. R. A., found at page 511, from which I read, and I ask the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Watson] to give me his attention:

Contracts purchasing or hiring the influence of another to further a particular election are wholly void. (Wilcox v. Puryear, 12 Ky. L. Rep., 556; Gaston v. Drake, 14 Nev., 175, 33 Am. Rep., 548; Swayze v. Hull, 8 N. J. L., 54, 14 Am. Dec., 399; King v. Raleigh & P. S. R. Co., 147 N. C., 263, 125 Am. St. Rep., 546, 60 S. E., 1133, 15 Ann. Cas., 40; Nichols v. Mudgett, 32 Vt., 546; Livingston v. Page, 74 Vt., 356, 59 L. R. A., 336, 93 Am. St. Rep., 901, 52 Atl., 965 (furthering a nomination); Whitman v. Ewin, — Tenn., —, 39 S. W., 742; Exchange Nat. Bank v. Henderson.)

In Whitman v. Ewin (— Tenn., —, 39 S. W., 742, infra) the court said:

"The greater his influence, the more powerful his eloquence, the more persuasive and effective his arts and skill, the more important it is that such powers and capabilities should be preserved and protected, unbought and unpurchasable, for the benefit of the State and the public weal, and only allowed to be brought into pernicious activity from purely patriotic and unselfish motives. * * * All such contracts as the one alleged are corrupt, contrary to public policy, illegal, void, and unenforceable in the courts."

"A contract by which one agrees, for money or other personal profit, to use his efforts, influence, etc., to induce a majority of the voters at an election to vote for a particular candidate or for any proposition, as for a subscription by a city or county in aid of a railroad, is against public policy, and therefore void." (Wilcox v. Puryear, supra.)

A promissory note is void which was made in consideration that the promisee should give the promisor his interest in pursuing his election to the office of sheriff, the note being payable after the election if the promisor was elected, and no recovery can be had upon it by the promisee against the promisor. (Swayze v. Hull, 8 N. J. L., 54; 14 Am. Dec., 399.)

So a contract between partners that one of them should become a candidate for the office of district attorney, the other to use his best efforts to secure his partner's election, and the fees of the office to be divided is void and will not support an action by the nonofficial partner, alleging the agreement to divide the fees and that he had rendered services to the other partner in his official capacity. (Gaston v. Drake, 14 Nev., 175; 33 Am. Rept., 548.)

The same is true of contracts securing the support of newspapers. Thus, a contract by a railroad to pay a newspaper editor for endeavoring in his paper to carry an election authorizing the issue of bonds for the building of a railroad and to gain for the railroad the good will of the citizens, etc., is void and will not sustain a recovery.

I am perfectly certain that in his sober moments the Senator from Georgia will indorse and support that proposition and that view of the law.

What is the occasion giving rise to statutes of this character? In the first place, it is often next to impossible in this case to determine whether the employment was really for the purpose of engaging the services of the person employed, or whether the employment was not to cover up plain bribery and corruption. In the second place, whether the employment is, from the standpoint of strict legality, a justifiable one or not every man who takes employment, by that very employment practically pledges himself to vote for the candidate in whose interest he is employed, for how could a man go about the State urging others to vote in favor of Mr. Newberry unless he himself purposed to do that same thing? So really every one of these employments is actually a purchase of the vote of the person who is thus employed.

These parties themselves understood perfectly well that what they were doing was contrary to the law. Indeed, the majority of the committee themselves must have been of the view that the employment of this whole army of paid workers, who were to go out in the State endeavoring to cause other citizens to become active in the interest of Mr. Newberry, was contrary to law because when they made their report to the Senate they told the Senate that the money was spent for the employment of clerks, stenographers, field men, and publicity men, which they say are not in any sense within the prohibition of the Michigan statute, leaving out of consideration the great body of employees who could not be brought under any one of those classes.

The committee knew, and they knew it because they took particular pains to pay these hired workers in cash as a general rule and not in checks. That is a feature of the case to which I desire to advert briefly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does it appear anywhere in the record how much money was paid to these hired workers?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; there is no summary that I know anything about.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand the Senator to state that it was very generally carried on throughout the whole State.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Every county had its chairman and its secretary, every precinct had its captain, and every one of them was paid. In addition to that, special men were hired and paid to canvass the Masons, others were hired to go through the fraternal organizations generally, another to go through the Spanish War veterans, another to canvass the laborers' end of the situation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is fair to assume from the statement made by the Senator that the expenses for that purpose must have been many thousands of dollars.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, many thousands, beyond question.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention to the fact also that they hired men to go through the Army and the Navy enlisted personnel.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, it has been stated that all this was publicly done and avowed. Does it appear in the record whether the men who went into the fraternal organizations, into the Masonic organizations as brother Masons, and into the Elks as brother Elks, and among the marines as comrades, made manifest and published the fact that they were paid by the day or the month to do that? Does that appear in the record?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My attention was diverted. Will the Senator kindly state his question again?

Mr. STANLEY. Did these paid agents advertise the fact that they were paid when they were appealing as Masons to Masons, and as Poles to Poles, and as marines to marines?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It does not so appear, and it is not presumed that they went around advertising how much they were being paid, or that they were being paid at all.

Mr. President, when this campaign started off about the 1st of March an account was opened at one of the banks in the name of "Paul King, chairman," and deposits were made in that account to the amount of something over $5,000. Checks were drawn on that account and when, according to the brief of Mr. Newberry, Blair was appointed treasurer that account was discontinued. I read from his brief at page 82, as follows:

The "Paul King, chairman," account was discontinued as soon as Mr. Blair had been chosen treasurer and the organization was perfected.

That account was closed out on the 7th day of May, 1917. Apparently, then, the 7th day of May is the time when Mr. Blair was appointed treasurer. Up to that time $5,000 had been drawn out of that account and paid out by some one.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Four months before the primary?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes. Although the statute of the State of Michigan provides that no money shall be paid out by anyone except by the treasurer of a political committee, yet upon the undisputed record here over $5,000 was paid out before Mr. Blair was ever appointed treasurer, as appears from the brief of Mr. Newberry.

However, Mr. President, about that time, instead of continuing the payment by check of all the obligations contracted in this campaign, a new system was adopted. A box in a vault in the basement of the Ford Building, in which the committee so called had its headquarters, was hired, the account being kept in the bank across the street—the Commonwealth Federal Savings Bank. A box was hired in the Ford Building across the street from the bank, a box in the vault in the basement, and in that box there were kept large amounts of cash that were employed for the payment of obligations of the committee. There were only two employees who had access to that box. One was the witness Emery, who has not been produced, and the other was the witness Turner, one of the men employed in the office.

Now, Mr. President, no kind of justification at all is made for the use of cash in the transactions of this committee except as I shall speak of directly. The treasurer, Blair, never knew about the existence of this box in which the cash was kept. At page 410 of the record he is interrogated upon this subject, as follows:

Senator POMERENE. Were there any moneys used in connection with this campaign which did pass through the hands of the treasurer?

Of course, that should read "did not."

Mr. BLAIR. I know of none.

Senator WOLCOTT. You have no knowledge on that subject?

Mr. BLAIR. I have no knowledge on that subject.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you learn they had a bank vault or box of very large size where they kept cash in large amounts?

Mr. BLAIR. I heard that story. I heard lots of other stories.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you investigate it?

Mr. BLAIR. I did not; it seemed foolish.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. It would seem a very foolish thing to do. They had a bank right in their own building, where their office was?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And your bank is just across the road?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, sir.

The witness testified that he saw at one time in that box at least three or four thousand dollars that was used. Of course, the testimony here to which I have heretofore adverted discloses that many of the payments were made in cash, and yet the statute of Michigan plainly provides that—

Every political party shall appoint a treasurer, who shall receive, keep, and disburse all sums of money which may be collected or received by such committee or by any of its members for election expenses; and unless such treasurer is first appointed it shall be unlawful for any political committee or any of its members to collect, receive, or disburse money for any such purpose.

Whatever money was kept in the box in that vault was kept without any knowledge whatever upon the part of Mr. Blair, and of course was paid out without his knowledge, because he did not even know about the existence of the box. Moreover, the record is replete with instances of payments having been made in utter defiance of the statute by Tom, Dick, and Harry; by Floyd; by King; by a lot of those paid agents. I agree that a campaign can not be carried on very well, as this was carried on, without cash for distribution, but it was just because it was carried on in violation of the law that that was necessary, and the cash was used beyond question for the purpose of concealing the employment or the payment of paid workers. Everybody knows that in these corrupt campaigns, in the use of corrupt practices of any kind, the usual payment by check is avoided and cash is used in order that it can not be traced.

What excuse is made for the use of this cash? In the first place, it was said that it was inconvenient to pay by check the people who were employed at headquarters; that they were asking cash. That is very foolish. Every employee of the Government here in Washington, 100,000 of them, is paid by check. There is no occasion to pay them by cash. Every great business corporation pays its employees by check and not by cash. It is much more convenient to do it by check. A record is preserved. A man goes home not with his pay cash but with his pay check ordinarily. Those of us who have run political campaigns recognize how utterly foolish it is to say that the pay roll at campaign headquarters can not be met by checks just as well if not better than it can be done by cash.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very gladly. I should like to hear from the Senator on this subject.

Mr. SPENCER. I thought the Senator would. Here are the facts, and I am wondering whether the Senator thinks there is the slightest criticism to be attached. One witness, as I remember it, did say in the exuberance of his testimony that he saw what he thought must have been a million dollars in that little box; but, of course, we agree that that was perfectly ridiculous.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course it looked big to him.

Mr. SPENCER. The testimony is, as the Senator has related, that somewhere between one and two or three thousand dollars was in the box.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Three to four thousand dollars.

Mr. SPENCER. No; the testimony is one or two thousand dollars. But the testimony of Mr. Turner, who had access to it, is not to that effect. As the Senator has well said, there were two who had access to it, Mr. Turner and Mr. Emery, and I do not believe we would have any doubt about the fact that it was a smaller amount; but whether it was $4,000 or $1,000, here is the fact of the case—

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SPENCER. In just a moment, when I shall have finished the answer, I shall yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I merely wanted to state the amount.

Mr. SPENCER. This money was in a safe deposit company vault. It was found, for example, that very frequently late in the afternoon when they wanted to buy stamps when their supply had run out or when they wanted to put an advertisement in a newspaper, strange as it may seem, the testimony was that—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was going to come to that. That was the second excuse.

Mr. SPENCER. A newspaper would receive no political advertisement accompanied by a check or any other guaranty in payment except cash. When those who had to do with the matter found that circumstance and that many times in the office some of the employees wanted their payments made in cash or desired to cash checks they found it convenient to have a certain amount of cash available. May I say to the Senator that that is just what the Senator avails himself of in this Chamber and what every one of us does. We are paid by check; we go to the cashier's office; there we give our personal checks and cash is obtained. That is for convenience and in order to have some place after the banks are closed and at inconvenient hours at which to get money. That is right here within 100 feet of where the Senator is standing, and it would be inconvenient to run the Senate without that cash in the cashier's office in this building. That is also true as to every business; a certain amount of cash is kept to meet the emergencies of the hour. That was done in this case.

The Senator, in looking from the beginning of the record to the end, will not find a single improper use of a dollar of that cash. All is suspicion and inference; there is nothing of fact.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. Kern got $400 of it in one envelope.

Mr. SPENCER. Certainly he did; it was in payment of his legitimate services.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the Senator from Missouri has given the best explanation he can of the matter, and I submit the sufficiency of it to the Senate. We have some cash here, as a matter of course, in the office of the Secretary of the Senate; but any Senator who goes there to get a dollar of cash is obliged to give his check for it, and there is a record of it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator from Montana or does the Senator from Missouri know from what source this money which was contained in the vaults came? Was there any effort by the committee to trace the source from which it came and to find out how it was distributed in cash?

Mr. SPENCER. The testimony shows that every dollar of contributions was entered and that the money in the vault was simply a part of the money that had been contributed for the campaign. It was not a separate fund; it was not an outside amount. Either a check was drawn on the bank and the cash was put in the safe deposit vault or it was put in there when some one came in and contributed in cash.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Do I understand the Senator from Missouri to say that the check was drawn upon the treasurer for the cash and the cash was deposited in the vault?

Mr. SPENCER. Yes; either that or—

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How many such checks for cash were drawn upon the treasurer?

Mr. SPENCER. I could not tell the Senator; but I was going to add either that, or if a man came in and made a contribution in cash, after his contribution had been entered some of it may have gone into the vault.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So that the committee, from any investigation they made, does not know whether there were $3,000 or $30,000 or $300,000 in that vault?

Mr. SPENCER. I was not there, and I only know from the testimony.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The committee could have inquired?

Mr. SPENCER. We did inquire, and the testimony of the man who did know about the vault was, as I recollect it, that there was kept in the vault an amount somewhere between $1,000 and $2,000 or $3,000, and that man, as I remember, was Mr. Turner.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And the treasurer says he knew nothing about one dollar?

Mr. SPENCER. He did not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. He knew nothing about the cash, and yet the Senator says checks were drawn upon the treasurer and cash was deposited in the vault.

Mr. SPENCER. That is undoubtedly one way by which that money went into the vault—by check on the treasurer—but the treasurer did not go there. He was the treasurer of the committee and did not have the minute management of the campaign any more than the treasurer of any other committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me ask the Senator from Missouri what does the statute mean?

Mr. SPENCER. There, Mr. President, we find again—and I may refer to that later on, as I have once before in all kindness—to what seems to me the brutal lack of proportion in this case. Certainly the Senator does not mean that when the statute says that disbursements by the committee must be made by the treasurer that the treasurer himself personally shall stand at the counter and pay every dollar that goes out from the committee. It merely means that he must be responsible for the disbursements of the committee; and Blair was responsible for the disbursements of the committee, and he made a statement under oath and filed it of every dollar that came in and of every dollar that was expended. That is all that the statute was intended to cover. Any other interpretation, I submit to the distinguished Senator from Montana, is technical; it is a sticking to the bark of the tree, which is a sticking to the letter of it. Qui haeret in litera, haeret in cortice—a man who sticks to the strict letter of the law and forgets its purpose, its reason, and its justice always loses sight of things in their just relationship.

The Senator knows from his remembrance of Blackstone that the law read that no man shall shed blood in the market place. That was the letter of the law. I can hear now some Senator vociferously demanding that the letter of the law be enforced, and so there were such men in that day, for they came before the tribune and said that a man had shed blood in the market place, and he was arrested and haled before the tribune, when it transpired that the blood which he had shed in the market place was the blood of a sheep which he had killed in the market place, and yet, sticking to the letter of the law, it was insisted that he was a criminal because he had killed in the market place a sheep which he intended to sell, and had thus shed blood in the market place. There is a sticking to technicalities that works brutal injustice. It may sound for a moment as if it were fair, but in working it out neither right nor justice comes from it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The statute has a meaning; it was intended to secure purity of elections and it was intended to compel a record to be kept so that every payment, however it was made, should go through a particular officer, and that he should be responsible for the transaction. If the treasurer draws a check to some one for an unlimited amount of cash and that person gets that cash and pays it out at libitum, then what becomes of the statute?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. The campaign committee apparently appreciated the requirements of the statute, because they had a bookkeeping department and an auditing department, but there is neither a book nor a paper of original entry that can be found anywhere by the committee or anybody else, and such records as we have here are simply copies from some other things which were thrown together.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is true. Since the Senator from Missouri said they did not keep books, I refer him to the testimony of Mr. Blair, who says that he did not know anything about it because Emery kept the books.

Mr. President, the Senator has anticipated me. I tried to tell the Senate what excuse is offered for keeping a large amount of cash on hand in a vault in the basement of the building in which the committee so-called had its headquarters. The answer is that it was necessary in order to pay for the help in the office, who were not satisfied to take checks; and now the Senator has supplemented that by saying that they needed some money to buy postage. Why, Mr. President, that is a very easy matter. The same statement is true with reference to the other excuse to which the Senator has called attention, namely, that the newspapers in the city of Detroit, it is said, had a rule by which they declined to accept checks from anybody on account of bills which had been incurred at their offices. Nobody ever went to a newspaper office, so far as the record in this case is concerned, from the Newberry headquarters to find out about the matter. We are simply told that the newspaper offices had a rule. Nobody sought to get any credit from the newspapers at all, but, Mr. President, suppose they did have such a rule as that, what difference does it make? It is not necessary to hire a vault in a bank in order to get large sums of money. When a bill is brought from a newspaper office, if the newspaper refuses to accept a check, the treasurer may draw a check to the secretary, indicating on it the statement that it is for the purpose, for instance, of paying the bill of the Detroit Evening News, and the secretary may go and get the cash, and pay the Detroit Evening News, and there will thus be a record of the transaction upon the books. So it is with the petty cash proposition for stamps and that kind of thing.

Mr. President, I have myself managed a campaign. It was no trouble at all to go to the post office and buy stamps. A check was drawn to the treasurer marked "for stamps" and he went to the post office with the cash and got the stamps, and there was a record that that amount of cash was released upon that check and that the money was used for the purpose of purchasing stamps.

Mr. SPENCER. Where would the check be cashed if it was drawn at 4 o'clock for an advertisement in the next morning's paper—in a drug store? The banks are all closed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no trouble about cashing it anywhere.

Mr. SPENCER. Where—at some hotel?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On Sunday afternoon, Mr. President, right in this city I have cashed checks.

Mr. SPENCER. That is because the Senator has such excellent credit. Some of us do not have.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. Newberry's credit in the State of Michigan is pretty good.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. Newberry did not cash a check.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. Blair was supposed to have drawn the checks, and he was vice president of the Union Trust Co.

Mr. SPENCER. And the Senator thinks because these checks were cashed out of a sum of money kept in a cash room that the Senator from Michigan ought to be unseated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; but I do state that the fact that these people paid off a large amount of money, as disclosed by the evidence, to men all over the State in cash is a suspicious circumstance and points clearly to the fact, first, that these payments were made in cash to hired workers and not by check because the committee recognized that they were violating the law in hiring them; and, in the second place, it lends powerful corroboration to the testimony of one witness that contributions were made by a large number of New York banks for the purpose of promoting the nomination of Mr. Newberry, none of which appear in the report at all.

Mr. President, there are some other features of this controversy that I should like to speak of, but I feel that I have already taken too much of the time of the Senate. It will be recalled no doubt that when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], at the close of his very masterly address, read from the scathing letter written by Gov. Osborn to Truman H. Newberry after the primary election, as he was approaching the termination of the letter was feverishly appealed to by the Senator from Missouri to read the concluding portion, in which the writer stated that it was his purpose to support the nominee of his party, however tainted his title as such nominee might be, in order to preserve the country from the menace of Fordism.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I want to assure the Senator that there was no fever on the part of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I spoke of the manifest impatience of the Senator.

Mr. SPENCER. I assure the Senator that the Senator from Missouri was not even impatient.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But, Mr. President, that is neither here nor there. No such alternative as confronted Gov. Osborn presents itself here. No Senator is under any obligation to make a choice between Henry Ford on the one side and Truman H. Newberry on the other, nor can he excuse himself to his constituents for any vote he may give here upon the matter pending upon any such ground. It is the unanimous conviction of the members of the committee that Mr. Ford was not elected, and no one is claiming that he is entitled to a seat in this body. He is out of the case. One may be pardoned, however, for regretting that, whatever may be his faults or his failings, his errors, or his deficiencies, the intimate of two successive Presidents—one a Democrat and the other a Republican—should not sit in this body to aid us with his counsel upon matters concerning which he is entitled to speak as one who speaks with authority.

Under a monarchical system social blemishes are all washed away when the subject of them is presented at court; and much ought to be regarded as forgiven to Mr. Ford on the Republican side of the Chamber since he is deemed worthy to go off on a fishing trip with President Harding. But, Mr. President, if "Fordism" were the peril which it was deemed to be by Gov. Osborn, it would not be anything like such a menace to have Henry Ford elected a Member of this body as would the seating of a man whose election was encompassed by the corruption that is so roundly and so justly denounced in the letter.

There are very few Henry Fords in this country. We do not produce them in quantity. One in a century is a pretty good average. On the other hand, there never has been any dearth of corrupt and corrupting millionaires who would, if they could, by fair means or by foul, break into the United States Senate. The vote on the pending resolution will be either an encouragement or a deterrent to those who harbor such an unholy ambition. It will be a measure of the public morality of the times.

There was a time in our history, not more than a generation ago, when it was regarded as no discredit to a man to have achieved a seat in this body by corrupt means, or to hold it by virtue of the favor of some great corporation whose interests, consequently, he was under obligation to protect and promote.

My own State, as I remarked a while ago, in that time achieved some unenviable notoriety. It came to be quite generally considered that a man had no business to aspire to represent his State here unless he was worth a million. A revulsion of public sentiment followed that at one time threatened to revolutionize our system and accomplish the abolition of the Senate. I address myself to Members upon the Republican side of this body: Are you prepared to publish to the world that the return of the Republican Party to power marks the restoration of the era when seats in the United States Senate were purchasable? It is a matter of very little consequence, so far as the public interest is concerned, whether the vast sums spoken of here as having been spent in the campaign were contributed by Truman Newberry or some one else. No poor man, no man of moderate means, could stand up against the expenditure. Practically unknown in his State, as the record conclusively shows, a man who, according to the testimony of a well-informed witness, would not be recognized by a thousand men throughout the broad State of Michigan if they saw him walking on the street, he yet bowled over every competitor, including William Alden Smith, who had had a long and honorable career in both Houses of Congress; Gov. Osborn, who shows himself a virile personality, if nothing else; Gov. Warner, three times elected chief executive of the State of Michigan; and Mr. C. B. Warren, member of the Republican committee from the State of Michigan and now minister to Japan.

Take warning! If you admit Newberry you will have a horde like him to deal with. Each will plead the fact that you took to your bosom others not less guilty. Take once the fatal step and you must prepare for the wrath to come, for the people of this great Republic who love it so well that they bared their breasts and poured out their treasure to repel a foreign foe will not suffer it to fall into ruin because of the more insidious but not less deadly enemies who assail it from within. The integrity of our institutions is justly said to be at stake in this controversy. It is, and the permanence of the existing social order is no less involved.

PROTECTION OF MATERNITY AND INFANCY.

During the speech of Mr. WALSH of Montana,
Mr. KENYON. I wish to ask concurrence in the House amendment to what is known as the maternity bill, but I do not know that it is proper to do it in the midst of the Senator's speech.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator desires to press it, I shall, of course, yield to him.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator permit me to do that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to ask that the Senate concur in the House amendment which has just been received by the Senate, to what is known as the maternity bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield the floor?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield for the consideration of the subject proposed by the Senator from Iowa, of course, if I do not lose the floor. I have not concluded my argument. I did not suppose any objection would be made on that ground, however. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill (S. 1039) for the public protection of maternity and infancy and providing a method of cooperation between the Government of the United States and the several States, and insert a substitute; also the House amends the title.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, there are only a few changes made by the House. The amount of the appropriation is lessened and there are one or two other matters which I think are very minor matters, even though the bill has been entirely redrawn and passed by the House. I do not wish to ask that the House substitute shall be read. I do not think it would be fair to take the time of the Senator from Montana for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I suggest that the Senator withhold the matter until I shall have concluded.

Mr. KENYON. Very well.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the House amendment may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will lie on the table.

After the conclusion of the speech of Mr. WALSH of Montana, Mr. WATSON of Georgia obtained the floor.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds, will he permit me to bring up the matter we had up a few moments ago during the speech of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With the understanding that I retain the floor.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendments of the House to Senate bill 1039.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1039) for the public protection of maternity and infancy and providing a method of cooperation between the Government of the United States and the several States, which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sums specified in section 2 of this act, to be paid to the several States for the purpose of cooperating with them in promoting the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 2. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, there is authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the current fiscal year $480,000, to be equally apportioned among the several States, and for each subsequent year, for the period of five years, $240,000, to be equally apportioned among the several States in the manner hereinafter provided: Provided, That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the use of the States, subject to the provisions of this act, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, an additional sum of $1,000,000, and annually thereafter, for the period of five years, an additional sum not to exceed $1,000,000: Provided further, That the additional appropriations herein authorized shall be apportioned $5,000 to each State and the balance among the States in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the States of the United States, according to the last preceding United States census: And provided further, That no payment out of the additional appropriation herein authorized shall be made in any year to any State until an equal sum has been appropriated for that year by the legislature of such State for the maintenance of the services and facilities provided for in this act.

So much of the amount apportioned to any State for any fiscal year as remains unpaid to such State at the close thereof shall be available for expenditures in that State until the close of the succeeding fiscal year.

Sec. 3. There is hereby created a board of maternity and infant hygiene, which shall consist of the Chief of the Children's Bureau, the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, and the United States Commissioner of Education, and which is hereafter designated in this act as the board. The board shall elect its own chairman and perform the duties provided for in this act.

The Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor shall be charged with the administration of this act, except as herein otherwise provided, and the Chief of the Children's Bureau shall be the executive officer. It shall be the duty of the Children's Bureau to make or cause to be made such studies, investigations, and reports as will promote the efficient administration of this act.

Sec. 4. In order to secure the benefits of the appropriations authorized in section 2 of this act, any State shall, through the legislative authority thereof, accept the provisions of this act and designate or authorize the creation of a State agency with which the Children's Bureau shall have all necessary powers to cooperate as herein provided in the administration of the provisions of this act: Provided, That in any State having a child-welfare or child-hygiene division in its State agency of health, the said State agency of health shall administer the provisions of this act through such divisions. If the legislature of any State has not made provision for accepting the provisions of this act the governor of such State may in so far as he is authorized to do so by the laws of such State accept the provisions of this act and designate or create a State agency to cooperate with the Children's Bureau until six months after the adjournment of the first regular session of the legislature in such State following the passage of this act.

Sec. 5. So much, not to exceed 5 per cent, of the additional appropriations authorized for any fiscal year under section 2 of this act, as the Children's Bureau may estimate to be necessary for administering the provisions of this act, as herein provided, shall be deducted for that purpose, to be available until expended.

Sec. 6. Out of the amounts authorized under section 5 of this act the Children's Bureau is authorized to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, to be taken from the eligible lists of the Civil Service Commission, and to purchase such supplies, material, equipment, office fixtures, and apparatus, and to incur such travel and other expense as it may deem necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act.

Sec. 7. Within 60 days after any appropriation authorized by this act has been made, the Children's Bureau shall make the apportionment herein provided for and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount estimated by the bureau to be necessary for administering the provisions of this act, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the treasurers of the various States the amount which has been apportioned to each State for the fiscal year for which such appropriation has been made.

Sec. 8. Any State desiring to receive the benefits of this act shall, by its agency described in section 4, submit to the Children's Bureau detailed plans for carrying out the provisions of this act within such State, which plans shall be subject to the approval of the board: Provided, That the plans of the States under this act shall provide that no official, or agent, or representative in carrying out the provisions of this act shall enter any home or take charge of any child over the objection of the parents, or either of them, or the person standing in loco parentis or having custody of such child. If these plans shall be in conformity with the provisions of this act and reasonably appropriate and adequate to carry out its purposes they shall be approved by the board and due notice of such approval shall be sent to the State agency by the Chief of the Children's Bureau.

Sec. 9. No official, agent, or representative of the Children's Bureau shall by virtue of this act have any right to enter any home over the objection of the owner thereof, or to take charge of any child over the objection of the parents, or either of them, or of the person standing in loco parentis or having custody of such child. Nothing in this act shall be construed as limiting the power of a parent or guardian or person standing in loco parentis to determine what treatment or correction shall be provided for a child or the agency or agencies to be employed for such purpose.

Sec. 10. Within 60 days after any appropriation authorized by this act has been made, and as often thereafter while such appropriation remains unexpended as changed conditions may warrant, the Children's Bureau shall ascertain the amounts that have been appropriated by the legislatures of the several States accepting the provisions of this act and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount to which each State is entitled under the provisions of this act. Such certificate shall state (1) that the State has, through its legislative authority, accepted the provisions of this act and designated or authorized the creation of an agency to cooperate with the Children's Bureau, or that the State has otherwise accepted this act, as provided in section 4 hereof; (2) the fact that the proper agency of the State has submitted to the Children's Bureau detailed plans for carrying out the provisions of this act, and that such plans have been approved by the board; (3) the amount, if any, that has been appropriated by the legislature of the State for the maintenance of the services and facilities of this act, as provided in section 2 hereof; and (4) the amount to which the State is entitled under the provisions of this act. Such certificate, when in conformity with the provisions hereof, shall, until revoked as provided in section 12 hereof, be sufficient authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to make payment to the State in accordance therewith.

Sec. 11. Each State agency cooperating with the Children's Bureau under this act shall make such reports concerning its operations and expenditures as shall be prescribed or requested by the bureau. The Children's Bureau may, with the approval of the board, and shall, upon request of a majority of the board, withhold any further certificate provided for in section 10 hereof whenever it shall be determined as to any State that the agency thereof has not properly expended the money paid to it or the moneys herein required to be appropriated by such State for the purposes and in accordance with the provisions of this act. Such certificate may be withheld until such time or upon such conditions as the Children's Bureau, with the approval of the board, may determine; when so withheld the State agency may appeal to the President of the United States, who may either affirm or reverse the action of the bureau with such directions as he shall consider proper: Provided, That before any such certificate shall be withheld from any State, the chairman of the board shall give notice in writing to the authority designated to represent the State, stating specifically wherein said State has failed to comply with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. No portion of any moneys apportioned under this act for the benefit of the States shall be applied, directly or indirectly, to the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair of any building or buildings or equipment, or for the purchase or rental of any buildings or lands, nor shall any such moneys or moneys required to be appropriated by any State for the purposes and in accordance with the provisions of this act be used for the payment of any maternity or infancy pension, stipend, or gratuity.

SEC. 13. The Children's Bureau shall perform the duties assigned to it by this act under the supervision of the Secretary of Labor, and he shall include in his annual report to Congress a full account of the administration of this act and expenditures of the moneys herein authorized.

SEC. 14. This act shall be construed as intending to secure to the various States control of the administration of this act within their respective States, subject only to the provisions and purposes of this act.

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act for the promotion of the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy, and for other purposes."

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following Senate bills:

S. 2555. An act to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Great Pee Dee River, S. C.;

S. 2594. Authorizing the counties of Allendale, S. C., and Screven, Ga., to construct a bridge across the Savannah River, between said counties, at or near Burtons Ferry;

S. 2722. An act to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the White River at or near the town of Des Arc, Ark.; and

S. 2724. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the White River, in Prairie County, Ark.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8347) to authorize the New York Central Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River within the corporate limits of the town of Gary, Ind., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 8347) to authorize the New York Central Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River within the corporate limits of the town of Gary, Ind., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 172) declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan, the pending question being on the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by Mr. WALSH of Montana.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it seems to me an extraordinary thing that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] should not have drawn attention to the fact that the Supreme Court in passing upon this case disposed of the very question which they raised and upon which I took issue with them. In the opinion of Justice Pitney, concurred in by Justices Brandeis and Clarke, will be found this paragraph:

It follows that one's entry upon a candidacy for nomination and election as a Senator with knowledge that such candidacy will come to naught unless supported by expenditure of money beyond the specified limits, is not within the inhibition of the act unless it is contemplated that the candidate shall have a part in procuring the excessive expenditures beyond the effect of his mere candidacy in evoking spontaneous contributions and expenditures by his supporters; and that his remaining in the field and participating in the ordinary activities of the campaign with knowledge of such activities furnish in a general sense the "occasion" for the expenditure is not to be regarded as a "causing" by the candidate of such expenditure within the meaning of the statute.

In that one paragraph in the decision of the highest legal tribunal on earth the entire argument on the law made by the able Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is smashed. I will add, further, that in civil law there has always been the principle that if it comes to my knowledge, by reason of a fact conveyed to me, that I ought to inquire into the activities of some one acting for me and I do not do it, I am charged with civil responsibility for whatever that investigation would have developed. Beyond that the common law does not go. Beyond that the rule of reason does not go.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was under the necessity of going to Canada to get an English law book to govern the votes of this body, which is made by the Constitution the judge of this case and every similar case. The Senator from Montana surely knows that the Canadian law follows that of England; and, if my information of the present English law is correct, no candidate can furnish a vehicle or conveyance of any kind to convey a voter to the polls, although he knows that that voter wants to vote for himself. It would void his seat in the House of Commons, if I have been correctly informed as to the rigor of recent English law; and of course the Canadian law follows that of the mother country.

There is no such law in Georgia; there is no such law in Kentucky; there is no such law in Missouri; there is no such law in the Federal statute books.

There are parts of these decisions in which there is no divided court at all, except upon the ground of the decision. I hold the opinions of all the justices in my hand, and every justice who spoke concurs in saying that the trial judge below misconstrued the statute upon which the defendants were being tried and that the case would have to go back for a new trial, and while Mr. Justice McReynolds held that the congressional law, known as the corrupt practices act, was void because it interfered with our power to be the full judges of the qualifications of the Members of this body, Chief Justice White simply differed from him in saying that he thought Congress had the right to pass such a law. That was the only difference, on a mere question of law on which two lawyers differ, just as two doctors might differ.

In discussing the case, it may interest the Senator from Montana, who is here—it will not interest the Senator from Idaho, because he is not here—to learn that Mr. Justice McReynolds disposed fully and finally of every contention set up by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I read that much. The court is quoting the opinion of the court below, and the full significance of this paragraph is contained in the last sentences. Therefore I ask Senators to reserve their opinion until I reach that last sentence. The court said:

Taken with the State enactment, the Federal statute in effect declares a candidate for the United States Senate punishable by fine and imprisonment, if (except for certain specified purposes), he give, contribute, expend, use, promise or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used or promised in procuring his nomination and election, more than $3,750—one-half of one year's salary. Under the construction of the act urged by the Government and adopted by the court below it is not necessary that the inhibited sum be paid, promised, or expended by the candidate himself, or be devoted to any secret or immoral purpose. For example, its open and avowed contribution and use by supporters upon suggestion by him or with his approval and cooperation in order to promote public discussion and debate touching vital questions or to pay necessary expenses of speakers, etc., is enough—and upon such interpretation the conviction below was asked and obtained.

Then the court goes forward and overturns the decision of the court below. It holds, further, that Congress may not set a limit, minimum or maximum, to what may be spent for the election of a candidate. That is the law as laid down by the Supreme Court, our Supreme Court, and since that decision was rendered apparently no steps have been taken by the Government or by any citizen to have anybody prosecuted under the State law of Michigan.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will recall that no steps were taken in the State of Illinois to prosecute anybody connected with the Lorimer matter. My recollection is that the Senator quite roundly denounced the flagrant corruption in the Lorimer case.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I did.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There was no prosecution in the State of Illinois that the Senator ever heard of, was there?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not know of any.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mark Hanna is reputed to have corrupted the legislature of the State of Ohio. I rather think the Senator made some charges to that effect, and quite roundly denounced the election of Mark Hanna by the Legislature of Ohio.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is quite probable; I do not remember.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There was no prosecution in the State of Ohio that the Senator ever heard of, was there?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I also stated that there were some charges made in regard to the State of Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite right, and I referred to that, and there was no prosecution in the State of Montana.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not see that that gets us anywhere.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; but the Senator contends that there is much properly to be inferred from the fact that there were no prosecutions in the State of Michigan.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I am not proceeding upon inference at all, Mr. President; I am going to argue the law and the facts; and before I shall have finished I will endeavor to lessen the heat of this debate and to increase the illumination. We have had a vast deal of noise, but we have not had much light. We are going to have some if I live to finish this speech.

I took occasion to say that the opinion of Chief Justice White was not a dissenting opinion, as was claimed by the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. It shows for itself that it is not. Chief Justice White concurred in the reversal of the judgment of the court below and remanded the case for a new trial, which it has never had and which it could have had if Mr. Ford had wanted it.

In this decision the Chief Justice expressly declared that there was no evidence whatever to sustain the charge of bribery. If that was not the essence of the case, I am unable to understand it. What was the charge? It was a charge that there was a conspiracy. To do what? To use money improperly; in other words, to corrupt; in other words, to bribe. The great Chief Justice, whose voice now speaks from the tomb in behalf of the living, said there was no evidence whatever to sustain the charge of bribery. Then upon what ground are we to be driven into expelling this man from the Senate, we, his jurors and judges?

There is another paragraph of his opinion which I will read into the record. He said:

Conspiracy to contribute and expend in excess of the amount permitted by the statute was, then, the sole issue, wholly dissociated from and disconnected with any corrupt or wrongful use of the amount charged to have been illegally contributed and expended. As putting out of view the constitutional question already considered, the errors assigned are based solely upon asserted misconstructions of the statute by the court in its charge to the jury, we bring the statute at once into view.

There the Chief Justice said again that the excess amount had nothing to do with the case.

Then he added a very pertinent suggestion, which I in a feeble and briefer way put to the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Idaho: If you, Mr. Senator, had a campaign committee appointed to do legal work for your election, and that committee is duped by some spy or agent of your opponent into authorizing that spy or that agent to do some illegal thing, ostensibly in your behalf, then away goes your seat, your enemies will take it from you by a stratagem, and you will defend yourself upon the well-known maxim that all tricks are justifiable in love and war.

I tried to point out to my distinguished friend from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that his construction of the law would put every innocent candidate at the mercy of the guilty. How could he know what his campaign committee was doing through his agent? How could he know when a spy would be put into his citadel and the gates opened to the enemy? He could not possibly know it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but I rise to say that no one, so far as I know, contends, certainly I do not, that under such circumstances the election would be void. It was only on the supposition that the candidate knew that the illegal practices were going on, or had reason to believe they were going on, or that they were so general and widespread as that the illegal practice really brought about the election, that the election would be void.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it amounts to the same thing. You impute criminality to an innocent man, and there is no principle of law, written or unwritten, that imputes to me a crime or imputes to you a crime. It may impute to us civil liability, but not crime. Crime must be proved by competent testimony beyond a reasonable doubt, and if it is circumstantial evidence, such as is relied on in this case to connect Truman Newberry with what was being done in his behalf that testimony must exclude every other reasonable hypothesis. If that is not the law, I do not know what the law is.

Proceeding where my friend the Senator from Montana interrupted me, I will read further from the opinion of the Chief Justice. He said:

To illustrate: Under the instruction given, in every case where to the knowledge of the candidate—

Now, I am coming right straight to the Senator from Montana, if he will pay a little attention—to the knowledge of the candidate a sum in excess of the amount limited by the statute was contributed by citizens to the campaign, the candidate, if he failed to withdraw, would be subject to criminal prosecution and punishment. So, also, contributions by citizens to the expenses of the campaign, if only knowledge could be brought home to them that the aggregate of such contributions would exceed the limit of the statute, would bring them, as illustrated by this case, within the conspiracy statute and accordingly subject to prosecution. Under this view the greater the public service and the higher the character of the candidate, giving rise to a correspondingly complete and self-sacrificing support by the electorate to his candidacy, the more inevitably would criminality and infamous punishment result both to the candidate and to the citizen who contributed.

That sounds to me like good law, like good common sense, and it does not in any way dissent from the majority opinion of the court, because Mr. Justice McKenna had already said substantially the same thing as Mr. Justice Pitney afterwards said. Again, the Chief Justice continued:

For the reasons stated, although I dissent from the ruling of the court as to the unconstitutionality of the act of Congress I, nevertheless, think its judgment of reversal should be adopted, qualified, however, so as to reserve the right to a new trial.

Does anyone call that a dissenting opinion? Why, it is not. It is a concurring opinion based upon a different ground. Nothing is much more common than that in Supreme Courts.

What has become of that new trial? When I asked that question the Senator from Montana, imagining himself to be in a justice of the peace court or arguing a case before a notary public, said, "Did you hear any more of the Lorimer case? Did you hear any more of the Clarke case? Did you hear any more of the Montana cases?"

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator to misquote me.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not wish to do so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I answered the Senator frankly. The court held that the Federal statute was unconstitutional and therefore there was no foundation for a new trial.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Oh, yes, there was; if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They could not try a man under an unconstitutional statute.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. But where are the Michigan State laws?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not talking about them. The Supreme Court of the United States could not order a new trial in the State courts.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. There was no power in the United States Supreme Court to inhibit in any way a State prosecution in the State court in Michigan. There were the statutes. It is said they have been violated. It has been said that Newberry was a party to the violation. Why has he not been prosecuted? Why have none of his agents been prosecuted in Michigan, in the vicinity where the crime was committed and before a jury of their peers?

Mr. President, before I came to this body the newspapers instilled me with the idea that Newberry had bought his seat. That was the saying everywhere, that "Newberry had bought his seat." Therefore, when the case was entered upon in this final court I expected to hear overwhelming testimony convicting Mr. Newberry of having bought his seat. When the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] fairly and fully flung his challenge to this side of the Chamber to point out the evidence of a single witness showing that Truman H. Newberry had spent one dollar or had been a party to the spending of one dollar for his election, I expected him to be crushed by replies from this side. But no reply was made then and no reply has yet been made. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] spoke parts of three days, large parts of two of them; the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] spoke parts of two days, large parts of both; but up to this time I have yet to hear a single scrap of testimony to sustain the charge that Truman H. Newberry bought his seat or had it bought for him. No such evidence had been presented.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator overlooks the testimony of Alfred Smith, set forth on page 24 of the majority report, where he testified, in response to questions from Judge Lucking, that Truman H. Newberry's funds were in this sum of money from which he was drawing.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I think I have heard that statement about a dozen times.

Mr. HEFLIN. Here it is, if the Senator desires to read it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Oh, yes; I know it is there. But if the Senator thinks that statement of that oft-quoted witness carries home to Truman H. Newberry the fact that he knew his funds were being illegally spent for his election, his construction of evidence is different from that of Greenleaf and different from that of myself.

Not one Senator on this side of the Chamber has yet said that Mr. Newberry had been the accomplice of anybody who had improperly used money. Does anybody say it now? Nobody says it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I can not permit that challenge to go unanswered.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Well, answer it then.

Mr. HEFLIN. I hold that all over $3,750 expended by Mr. Newberry, by his brother, by his sisters, by his partners in business, by anybody for him, was illegally spent, and that the procuring of the nomination through the use of those funds was illegal.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Then, if the Senator from Alabama, my good friend Mr. HEFLIN, had argued his point of view before the Supreme Court the decision might have been different. Not having had the benefit of his legal lore, his splendid eloquence, and his forceful presentation of the facts, the Supreme Court did not decide that way.

Mr. President, on last Saturday, while the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was speaking, I asked him a question in regard to what was said in the decision of the Supreme Court exonerating Truman H. Newberry from bribery, and the Senator said, with his usual frankness, "Oh, well, there is no bribery." Well, if there was no bribery, he did not buy his seat. If there was no bribery, nobody bought his seat. It seems to me that the admission of the Senator from Montana puts his case out of court, except for mere oratorical purposes and for campaign use.

I mean to let the country know that there is not a particle of testimony here that Truman H. Newberry bought his seat or had it bought for him—not a particle. I have not read all the thousands of pages of these questions and answers in the record. Our State supreme court, and I suppose other supreme courts, do not now tolerate the presentation of a case in that way. They require that the narrative form be adopted, so that the reader will not have to straggle and struggle with question and answer and cross-question and cross-answer through thousands of pages. But I have done this: I listened most of the three days to the very able speech of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. I listened most of the two days of the very able speech of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I heard them read into the record what they supposed to be the strongest evidence against Truman H. Newberry. I have read the report of the majority. I have read the report of the minority. I studied carefully the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. It would seem that I studied it with more care than is customary with those who are contending that this man and his State should both suffer the greatest indignity which this body could put upon them. Acting as a juror and under oath, I must have evidence, competent testimony, which convinces me beyond a reasonable doubt that Truman H. Newberry was a party to the crime that put him in the Senate, if anybody committed a crime in that connection, else my own conscience would not be satisfied, and I think a good deal more of that than I do of the opinions of others.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator desire to have a quorum call?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the issue in Michigan in the election between Mr. Ford and Mr. Newberry was pretty much the same as it was in Georgia, to wit, the League of Nations. We can not start up a rabbit on this side and chase him for 15 minutes, but what we find him running into the League of Nations. Well, the rabbit may go in, but we are not going in. Michigan is normally a Republican State, just as Georgia is normally a Democratic State; and it is no more extraordinary that Michigan should send two Republican Senators here than it is that Georgia should send two Democratic Senators here. It is a normal state of things. Anything else would be abnormal and would of itself excite suspicion and court investigation. As to the methods used and the money used and the laws of Michigan, I shall come to them later, and I shall discuss them like a lawyer talking to lawyers.

First of all, how did Mr. Ford get into the senatorial race? The man who helped him found his magazine alleges, in the issue of September 17, 1921, that Mr. Ford did not wish to enter the race; that he came to Washington upon the invitation of President Wilson; that Mr. Ford was accompanied on that trip by his attorney; that the attorney had a written statement in his pocket ready to give to the press telling the country that he would not be a candidate; and that after going into the White House and having an interview with President Wilson, he came out and told his lawyer to destroy that statement because he had determined to enter the race. Has that statement been denied? Will anybody now deny it? Now is a pretty good time to deny it.

President Wilson, holding the views he did, with the golden 14 points—his famous 14, which are now the "lost golden fleece" of nations, very naturally wanted a vote here in the Senate in favor of the League of Nations. Consequently he conscripted Mr. Henry Ford. He wanted Mr. Newberry defeated because he knew or believed that Mr. Newberry would vote against the league. It was necessary to bring into action another Senator who would support Wilsonism and the League of Nations. That is the real secret of the mighty effort made in Michigan to overcome a normal Republican majority and that is the real secret of the savage hatred against Mr. Newberry such as has been shown on the floor of the Senate by the left-over Wilsonites. There are a few of them left, but there will be fewer the next time the people get a whack at them.

Who is Henry Ford and what were his qualifications for a seat in this Chamber, the most august lawmaking body in the world or that ever was in the world? He is a man who has made a wonderful success in accumulating millions of dollars. If he were in Wall Street, he would feel the thunder and lightning of my friend the Senator from Alabama at least once a week. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. I am trying to keep Wall Street from seating a Member of this body now.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Since Henry Ford is getting Muscle Shoals, the Senator from Alabama had better look out for Alabama. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. We want Muscle Shoals to be operated by somebody.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I notice that the Senator from Alabama is retiring from the combat. That is his privilege.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Alabama has not retired. He merely stepped to the cloakroom in order to get a tablet to make a note of some of the propositions which the Senator from Georgia is making in order to respond to them later.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator from Alabama has returned, and that is all right. It is his privilege to go and it is his privilege to return.

Mr. HEFLIN. I merely wish to take a few notes of what the Senator from Georgia is saying.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator may take all the notes he desires.

Henry Ford is a man who brought a libel suit against a certain newspaper in Chicago. He went on the witness stand, was sworn, and examined in his own behalf, and, according to the newspapers, he swore that he did not know how to read. He is as marvelous a witness as he has been a marvelous gatherer of gold. Talk about golden chariots! The Newberry family could hardly furnish pin money for Henry Ford's family.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I yield with pleasure, Mr. President.

Mr. STANLEY. If this were a case between Henry Ford and Newberry, we might well say "dog eat dog." Ford, however, is a man of marked characteristics. The difference between Ford and Newberry apparently is that Ford is more than a millionaire, while Newberry seems to be a typical mere millionaire.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The same thing might have been said—

Mr. STANLEY. But, be that as it may, I would not permit Henry Ford or Truman H. Newberry or any other man born of woman to buy a seat in the Senate. The charge against Ford is a mere smoke screen to the offenses that have been proved against the contestee—offenses not against an individual; that is a matter of small importance, for, as I see it, Newberry is not on trial here; Ford is not on trial here; but the Senate is on trial.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I did not yield for a speech. The Senator from Kentucky may make a speech in his own time. I thought he wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. STANLEY. I thought I would tell the Senator about this race.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator from Kentucky has not told me much about it.

Mr. STANLEY. It is more than a race between a golden chariot and a "tin Lizzie."

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I repeat, the Senator has not told me much about it. I am going to tell him something about it; I promise him that.

Recurring to the point where the interruption cut me off, Henry Ford is reported to have sworn that he could not read, and yet he is editing a weekly paper devoted to war upon the Jewish race—not upon some criminal Jew, convicted or unconvinced, but upon the whole race—the race that produced Moses, Solomon, David, Rachel, Gambetta, Disraeli, Sir Moses Montefiore, and Jesus Christ. All Christendom rests upon a Book, and that Book is the Book holding the creed of the Jew. Nevertheless, Henry Ford condemns the whole race, forgetting that in all our wars the Jew has fought side by side with the Gentile, forgetting that the soundest principles of democracy and good government and catholic humanity are to be found in the sacred parchments of the Jews, forgetting that the present French Republic was founded by a Jew, and that Jews compose music that will perhaps outlive the Pyramids and every government that now stands upon the globe.

I would wage relentless warfare upon a convicted Jew, and would have him punished for a heinous crime, as the Jewish law itself provides, but I doubt the senatorial fitness of a man who indicts a whole race because of the faults of some of its black sheep.

In that famous Chicago case Henry Ford is reported to have sworn that he did not know who Benedict Arnold was, but was inclined to believe that he was the man who wrote Matthew Arnold's literary works. It is a wonder to me that Mr. Ford did not say that one or the other of these Arnolds wrote Shakespeare's plays and Washington's Farewell Address.

What were the relations between Mr. Henry Ford and President Woodrow Wilson? Mr. President, as my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] would say, this is a serious question. Did not Henry Ford give $50,000 to Wilson's campaign fund during the last month of the struggle in 1916, and do so at the personal request of Mr. Tumulty? It is so stated in this paper published by Henry Ford's ex-partner, and it was published in September, and now we are nearly at December, and nobody has denied it. Will anybody now deny it? It is a pretty good time to make a denial.

My friend from Alabama says he is making notes. Let him make one of this.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will state to my friend from Georgia that I never heard of that contribution before; but if he made the contribution to the Democratic campaign fund when Wilson was the candidate he could not have contributed to a better cause.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I expected some such reply as that from my friend from Alabama. It was the best that could be made, of course.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. For a question, yes; not for another beautiful speech.

Mr. STANLEY. I am not going to make a speech. The Senator seems to be proceeding upon the idea that this is a contest between Newberry and Ford.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senator will just wait upon me a moment, because I am not going to speak two days—

Mr. STANLEY. It will not take the Senator two minutes to answer that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I will get to that in less than two minutes, if I am not again interrupted.

Mr. STANLEY. All right.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Did that liberal gift have anything to do with keeping Henry Ford's son out of the Army, when so many hundreds of thousands of other men's sons were in the Army, thousands of them fighting, suffering, dying in Flanders and in France, while Edsel Ford was continuing to make tin Lizzies to run against golden chariots? Mr. President, I supposed that the last golden chariot that we ever had went up to heaven when a Jewish prophet went up. Did the Senator from Kentucky ever see a golden chariot?

Mr. STANLEY. Not until Ford started on his tour—I mean, not until Newberry started on his tour through Michigan.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Oh! The Senator gets there mixed. He has got the evidence mixed, too.

Mr. President, what else did Henry Ford get out of Wilson's honest and patriotic administration? It was reported that he got $14,000,000 for the construction of Eagle boats which were either useless or not constructed; and when that fact was brought home to Henry Ford he said he was going to return the money to Uncle Sam. I was anxious to have a front seat and see Henry do that, but he never has done it.

Let us come to something more specific, proven by the records of the War Department.

The Ford Motor Co., according to the War Department, received from Wilson's administration $249,000 for tools which were never delivered. I suppose Henry has them yet. He also has the money, unless he has spent it on this election.

The Ford Motor Co., for tractors: Number delivered, none. Amount paid, $1,209,000. Where are those tractors? They might be converted into golden chariots, for all I know.

The Ford Motor Co., for spare parts: Number delivered, none. Amount paid, $5,517,000. That leaves out the Eagle boats.

Those facts came from the War Department to Congressman Bege, and they came out after the fishing trip which Mr. Ford took with President Harding. If President Harding now knows those facts, Henry Ford may not again go fishing with the President.

There was a prosecution of Truman H. Newberry and a number of his workers—135 as I remember the number. The records of the Department of Justice show that Mitchell Palmer, the Attorney General, paid out $73,000 for fees for extra lawyers. If there was such a plain and simple case against Truman Newberry and these 135 men, why could not the Attorney General or one of his assistants, or the district attorney and one of his assistants, conduct the case?

Besides that, the Department of Justice sent to Michigan more than 100 detectives to rake the State with a comb to find evidence of criminality on the part of Truman Newberry and his workers. Did they find it? If it was there, they should have done so. If they found it, what became of it; it is not in this record. Talk about loss of papers! We heard a great deal about loss of papers. Who lost the papers from Mitchell Palmer's Department of Justice as to the expense accounts of these 100 detectives during the months and months that they were combing Michigan in the effort to find testimony upon which to convict Mr. Newberry and his workers? It is not in the Department of Justice. How were these detectives paid? Were they paid by checks? If so, where are the checks? Was there a stub for each check? If so, where is the stub? Was there an expense account? If so, where is it? Let my friend from Alabama make another note right there.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator forgets that the testimony here shows that Mr. Newberry's man failed to produce those records when summoned specifically to do so.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes; and the testimony shows why.

Mr. HEFLIN. He said they had been lost, or something.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. When a Government loses its records, it seems to me that there is something more mysterious about it than when a private individual loses one; and I do not think it lies in the mouth of the Government to be making criminal charges against Newberry and his friends when it paid out so much of the people's money without authority.

How many people in this country know that in addition to the district attorney and his assistants, the Attorney General and his, $73,000 of their money was put into the pockets of lawyers to have convicted Mr. Newberry and his friends? How many of the people of this country know that the Department of Justice was so eager to put Newberry in the penitentiary, where he could not vote against the League of Nations, that they sent more than 100 Secret Service men to Michigan and kept them there for months hard at work to drum up testimony which they could not find?

It is said that the Department of Justice under Mr. Mitchell Palmer spent more than $400,000 in their efforts to convict Mr. Newberry and send him to the penitentiary. Were they simply trying to get rid of Newberry, or were they trying to get Ford in? That is a common-sense question. A mere vacancy here was not worth $400,000. It is not worth that much now.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does not the Senator think that the Government, though, would be justified in spending almost any amount to keep these seats from becoming a matter of barter?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, that question would come with better grace from somebody who had not supported a President who asked $50,000 from Henry Ford and got it, and in whose behalf money was spent like water from one end of this country to the other, and everybody knows it was spent like water.

Now I come to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. In substance that amendment says that Michigan held a primary in which rival candidates ran for the nomination and that nobody got the nomination. It says, in effect, that Michigan had a general election in which there were rival candidates, and in that election nobody got elected. Oh, what a strange state of imbecility Michigan has fallen into—nominating primaries, and no nomination; general elections, and nobody elected. Well, if Mr. Newberry was not elected, why was not Ford the man who should have had the commission? Usually, when two men run, one of them is entitled to the commission; and they were so anxious to get Mr. Ford in here, with his vote in favor of the League of Nations, that they had a recount. That does not look very much like they were ignoring the claims of Mr. Ford.

It has been said here with a good deal of emphasis that Mr. Newberry was not known in his own State. Mr. President, that is no unusual thing in a public servant. One of the best men who ever represented Georgia in Washington city sat on the Interstate Commerce Commission in his earlier days, Judson C. Clements, and I do not suppose he was known to a hundred men in Georgia. A. O. Bacon was Senator here for many years, and he mixed so little among our people that not half the people of his own city—Macon, Ga.—knew him by sight. He was a name, an honored name, but only that; and had he run for something else, or indeed when he did run for reelection, he needed publicity and he got it in the daily papers and in the weekly papers, and I assume that it cost something; and I think if it did he violated no law.

Mr. President, there is pending in the House of Representatives a very serious charge, made, not by an obscure Frenchman, but by the eminent author of the latest history of France, Gabriel Hanoteaux.

In that statement, first given out in Paris, and which came to my notice two years ago, this historian says that our country was "propagandaed" into the war by the international banking house of J. P. Morgan & Co. A Congressman has introduced a bill in the other House to have that charge investigated, and no investigation is made. As the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] would say, "Mr. President, this is a very serious matter."

How was the sale of the Liberty bonds to our people, to the amount of $25,000,000,000, put over?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the Senator from Georgia, speaking seriously, now, with his learning, with his knowledge of this body and of the House of Representatives, in his heart harbor the remotest suspicion that J. P. Morgan & Co., or any other gang of financiers, or any other concern, ever had gold enough to buy the House of Representatives and the Senate and the President of the United States into a declaration of war, carrying with it the honor and the life of our country? That is what his statement means.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the question is quite aside from any opinion I expressed, but I will answer it frankly. The time when our Government should have entered into the war, in my opinion, was when the Germans torpedoed the Lusitania and killed 119 American men, women, and children who were peaceful travelers.

Mr. STANLEY. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Did the Senator agree with me then?

Mr. STANLEY. I thought that was the time when we should have gone in.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Did the Senator say so then?

Mr. STANLEY. I did. Before the national convention at St. Louis I urged the resolutions committee, of which Senator WALSH was the chairman, to pass a resolution to that effect. I spoke for it there and urged that we take a battle flag into that convention. But that does not make Wilson a crook or the House of Representatives and the Senate superserviceable tools of J. P. Morgan & Co.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, as I have said, I think we lost the golden opportunity, when we had a real cause of war, and it should have been chiefly a naval war, aided by such men as chose to volunteer to go across the water. That is my frank answer. But if the Senator from Kentucky wants to defend the banking firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. for its activities before the war, during the war, since the war, and right now, he is quite welcome to do it, so far as I am concerned.

I was asking, how did we float the Liberty bonds? Were there any newspapers paid to carry full page advertisements? Were there any speakers hired to make speeches? Were there any commissions given? What was the power that compelled our people to go into the depths of debt and misery to buy this enormous issue of bonds, $25,000,000,000 of them, if not publicity, just such as is charged was used in this campaign, or propaganda? It was propaganda. Human nature is so constituted that the reader of a daily paper, seeing the same thing written day after day, and nobody allowed to deny, finally takes it to be the truth. Some Frenchman, I think it was Mirabeau, said that the wisest man would come to believe the silliest thing, if his valet repeated it to him every morning while he was dressing. A great many of our people take their opinions from the headlines of the daily papers. Comparatively few read anything else, and I am sure the Senator from Kentucky will agree with me about that. The point I wished to make was that the method employed by Truman H. Newberry to make himself known to the voters of Michigan, while he was serving in New York, was substantially the same used by the Wilson administration in putting over those vast issues of bonds.

My friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] became humorous when he spoke of the picture which Commander Newberry had taken of himself on a wooden ship in Central Park, N. Y. That is a good deal nearer than you ever got Henry Ford to the war, and it was a good deal nearer than you ever got Edsel Ford to it. You never got him on any wooden ship or any other kind of a ship. You got him in "tin Lizzies" all right, and you got him in the United States Treasury all right, and you did not get any "Eagle" boats worth mentioning, but he got millions of your money for goods he never delivered. He was the man who was commandeered to come in here as a Senator, and he said himself that he thought Benedict Arnold wrote Matthew Arnold's essays.

Mr. President. I find that the Michigan statutes are quoted in the very able brief filed in the Supreme Court by Mr. Charles E. Hughes, now Secretary of State, who last Monday made that noble speech before the Limitation of Armament Conference which still rings round the world, and will have its benign influence on generations yet unborn, not only in this, but in every other country.

I will read from the brief, because the print is better than the print used in the Pomerene report, and therefore it is easier for me to read. The statutes of Michigan are exceedingly broad as to the money which a candidate may use, or which his friends may use for him. There is virtually no limit to these expenditures. The first group of activities for which money may be spent includes traveling expenses, printing, stationery, advertising, postage, expressage, freight, telegraph, telephone, and public messenger services. That is a pretty broad scope, and would permit the expenditure properly of a very large amount of money. I know that during my campaign in Georgia there was a speech of my own which I wanted to get in a certain daily paper, and I asked what would be charged to print it, and the price was so high as to be prohibitive, and I could not and did not have it printed. Everybody knows that a campaign year is a picnic year for newspapers—weekly, triweekly, daily, and monthly. I read now from the brief the list of those things for which expenditures might be made:

- Second. For dissemination of printed information to the public.
- Third. For political meetings, demonstrations, and conventions.
- Fourth. For the rent, maintenance, and furnishing of offices.
- Fifth. For the payment of clerks, typewriters, stenographers, janitors, and messengers actually employed.
- Sixth. For the employment of challengers at primaries and elections to the number allowed by law as such.
- Seventh. For the payment of public speakers.

Mr. President, I have been making public speeches since I was 19 years old. I never got paid for a public speech in my life, except a strictly advertised lecture, confined to a lecture hall, and to a lecture audience who paid their admission fee. But the statute of Michigan allowed Henry Ford and Truman Newberry to hire speakers to go out, accompanied by bands of musicians, to influence voters. You would not want a speaker who could not influence a voter, would you? You would not hire a speaker who would drive off voters, would you? You would not want a band that did not play good music, would you? You would not want a band that would make such a jangle of discord that everybody would run off, would you? You would hire the best that was in the market, and that would take a good deal of money.

I tried to hire a band once in my campaign in Georgia, and I found that they wanted a hundred dollars, and as that was more than I thought the music was worth, I did not hire them.

- Eighth. For copying and classifying, etc.
- Ninth. For making canvasses of voters.

It is as to the construction of that last clause that my friend from Montana differs from me, as to the hiring of canvassers for voters. He says that simply means to find out how a man is going to vote. I think that is a very narrow construction. If it did not mean something more than that, they would not be worth paying for. It means what a speaker means; it means what a band means; it means, in my judgment, the presentation to the voters of whatever claims the candidate may have.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me ask the Senator, if that is the proper interpretation, why this other provision, that you may hire public speakers for these public meetings?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Because it is not every canvasser who can speak, and it is not every speaker who can canvass.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If "canvassers" includes them all, what is the use of the other provision?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. They are in separate clauses.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; but the Senator's definition of "canvassers" would include them all?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Not at all; not by any means. You select your public speaker. Did you know beforehand how he stood? Does the fee you pay him influence his opinion? Does not the Michigan law put him in the position of an attorney, who may have no opinion at all about a case until he is hired to plead it for one side or the other?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator suffer another interruption?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand the Senator to say that the ninth clause, "For making canvasses of voters," includes those who are to canvass and induce the voters to vote. If so, I inquire why should subdivision 7 be put in, providing for the payment of public speakers and musicians at public meetings, and their necessary traveling expenses, if all of them are covered in subdivision 9?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I had already answered that, as I thought, but I will make another attempt.

A man may be a very finished orator; he may be able to make the welkin ring, to use our old friend as an expression; he may be able to sway the multitude by his voice and by his eloquence. He is hired for that purpose, and yet in private conversation he might be as dull as a grindstone which sharpens other things and never gets sharp itself.

Why, Mr. President, if the hiring of men to make canvasses does not necessarily imply that they canvass, what is the meaning of the word canvassers? A canvasser is a man who does canvass, presumably with legal propriety.

I read further:

Eleventh. For employing as counsel, attorneys licensed to practice in accordance with the laws of the State, and for the necessary expenses of such counsel.

That covers almost everything that one could expect to be done to carry an election. It absolutely covers everything that is in this record. The man who was Henry Ford's partner in the establishment of his magazine and who could not agree with him about his policy has said that Henry Ford's managers had the Michigan statutes before them all the time and carried them out to the letter and in the spirit as far as they understood them.

Much has been said here about the failure to produce a witness whose illness, as claimed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], was somewhat derisively referred to by Senators on this side. In this magazine of September that very matter is referred to. The name of the witness is B. F. Emery, a clerk in the Newberry headquarters during the campaign. What does this ex-partner of Ford say about that witness? He said:

I have never seen him that I know of, but I have looked into his case and had a personal experience that impressed me. There were many sneers in the Ford report, and one would think that the illness which kept him from going to Washington was a fake. By a coincidence Emery was injured by one of Henry Ford's automobiles—that is, belonging to Ford. The machine tipped over—pinning Emery under it. There were three fractures of the skull, an injured chest, broken ribs, dislocated hip, and other bruises. He was in the hospital many weeks and is still a great sufferer from his injuries.

Not the golden chariot, but the "tin Lizzie"—

For which, by the way, he has brought suit against Mr. Ford.

Another interesting item in this paper is that Mr. Henry Ford made a present of an automobile to every Ford club in Michigan. If that is allowed by the Michigan statutes, I fail to get their meaning.

A good deal has been said about the failure of Mr. Newberry to appear before the committee. Well, he has been absent from the Senate during the whole time that these savage attacks have been made upon him. Supposing him to be a gentleman of some feeling, I can respect his absence. I would not have wanted to sit here and listen to such tirades of abuse leveled at me as were leveled at him. If I could not then and there have replied, I would have absented myself from the Chamber and remained away until the storm passed over, leaving it to my friends and all fair-minded men to take care of the justice of my cause.

Speaking for myself, I do not know Mr. Newberry by sight. I passed him one day in the corridor when the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] had been suddenly taken ill. That is the only time I ever saw Mr. Newberry. I was there to do what I could for the Senator from South Dakota, rather than anything else.

Mr. Newberry had already made solemn oath to the fact that he spent nothing to gain his seat and did not consent to or know of the use of any money in his behalf. His swearing to it a second time would not have added to the strength of his first affidavit.

Mr. President, I think it an unfortunate thing that Senators from the South should take such a prominent part in what I consider a political persecution. If I may be allowed the expression of an opinion, it is that unless the evidence absolutely compelled us to speak it would have been better for us not to have spoken. We should remember that Michigan held the frontier in the War of 1812, met the Kentuckians at the River Raisin, fought side by side with the Kentuckians there, and gave Andrew Jackson time to come up to the defense of New Orleans. It is true that poor old Gen. Hull, from New England, and not from Michigan, did surrender Detroit when the court-martial said he should not have done it. I am glad to remember that it was a southern President, James Madison, who reversed the finding of that court-martial and gave that old man back his honor and his freedom.

The passions of the Civil War, the most deplorable war that mankind had ever known prior to the late World War, are far from dead. The ashes cover them, but the live coals are there, and we meet the sectional feeling on every turn where it is sectional against section, interest against interest. It would be a wise policy if it could be made consistent with principle and conviction for us never to do a thing that would blow those cooling embers into another blazing flame. When we do so, we simply injure our own people and our own selves.

Mr. President, during the time when the passions of the Civil War were still raging and the waves of hatred were leaping up like storm-tossed waves on the ocean Congress endeavored to impeach a southern man, Andrew Johnson, a man whose powerful speeches had done more to save the border States to the Union than all other influences combined. But when he ventured to differ from the radical Republicans of that day they endeavored to impeach him and to bring everlasting disgrace upon him, his family, and his State. They failed by one vote, and that vote came from Kansas. So great were the passions of that era that the man who was brave enough to speak his convictions to save that southern man never again held a public office. According to my recollection, he died last year. But Tennessee resented the persecution of Andrew Johnson on what they now commonly accept as frivolous charges and she returned him to the Senate, where he could face on equal terms the men who had arraigned him and tried to disgrace him.

Of course, it is in the power of the Senate to expel Truman H. Newberry, who has been sitting here for more than a year and who will, as surely as day follows night, come back if we do expel him. The work would be entirely futile, would defeat itself if it were done. I am finding no fault with the Senators whose convictions lead them to speak against him or to vote against him, but I have studied this case as thoroughly as any Senator here, and my convictions are perfectly satisfactory to my own conscience and I shall answer for them to the only people to whom I am responsible, the people of Georgia.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Merely to keep history right, I desire to say that in the course of a colloquy between myself and the esteemed Senator from Georgia [Mr. WARSON] he stated as a matter of history that the so-called Dartmouth College case was decided by Chief Justice Marshall upon a point that was not even raised by Daniel Webster. I have heard that statement made before, and I rise for the purpose of correcting it. I have before me the report of the case and the brief of Mr. Webster. I read from page 588 as follows:

The plaintiffs contend, in the second place, that the acts in question are repugnant to the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States. The material words of that section are: "No State shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts."

Mr. Webster then discusses the question as to whether the repeal of the charter or an amendment to the charter does violate that provision of the Constitution. He argues that a charter is a contract, and he canvasses all the decisions of the Supreme Court down to that time dealing with the provision of the Constitution which forbids any State to pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts, which was the point upon which the case turned. Then he concludes the argument, as is reported at page 595 of the same volume, as follows:

It is therefore contended that this case falls within the true meaning of this provision of the Constitution, as expounded in the decisions of this court; that the charter of 1769 is a contract, a stipulation, or agreement, mutual in its consideration, express and formal in its terms, and of a most binding and solemn nature. That the acts in question impair this contract has already been sufficiently shown. They repeal and abrogate its most essential parts.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Alabama will allow me a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The point upon which Chief Justice Marshall decided that case was not in the brief from which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has read at all. It was in the brief of Jeremiah Mason. My authority for my statement that Mr. Webster did not originate the point—perhaps, I ought to have used that word—is Henry Cabot Lodge's Life of Washington, in which he gives a very full and very interesting history of that case.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhulse, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

TAX REVISION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama permit me to interrupt him to address the Chair on a privileged question, a conference report?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly. How long does the Senator think it will take?

Mr. PENROSE. Not more than a few moments, I think.

Mr. HEFLIN. Very well; or if Senators on the other side desire to take a recess after the report is received, I can conclude in the morning.

Mr. PENROSE. I think we are working toward that end, if the Senator will permit me. I do not intend to push the report now. I simply want to have it before the body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received.

W. R. GREEN,
NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PENROSE. Now, I understand, the report is before the Senate, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside. Is that the status of the matter?

Mr. SPENCER. I ask that the pending unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order to make way for the conference report.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I can go on in the morning and finish then?

Mr. SPENCER. Surely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief statement.

I desire to inform the Senate that I shall call up the conference report the first thing in the morning. I will not ask to have the report read now, but it will appear in the RECORD and it can be read, if necessary. I desire further to inform the Senate that I shall hope to have the report adopted by this body to-morrow; and, if the Senator from Alabama does not object, I shall move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning; but, in the meanwhile, that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that after the consideration of executive business the Senate will take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 20 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION OF COURTS.

Mr. CUMMINS. I report back favorably, from the Committee on the Judiciary, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 6053) to amend section 955 of the Revised Statutes by extending the jurisdiction of courts in cases of revivor. I ask that the bill be put on its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 12, after the word "extend," at the end of line 11, to strike out "over foreign executors and administrators of any party who dies before final judgment or decree equally with their jurisdiction over executors and administrators appointed under the laws of a State within the judicial district of the court in which the action is pending," and to insert "to and over executors and administrators of any party, who dies before final judgment or decree, appointed under the laws of any State or Territory of the United States," and on the same page, in line 24, after the words "suit," to strike out "And for such purposes the territorial limits of the court in which the suit may be pending at the time of the death of a party are hereby expressly extended so as to include the State or Territory in which an executor or administrator of the deceased party may be appointed," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 955 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 955. When either of the parties, whether plaintiff or petitioner or defendant, in any suit in any court of the United States, dies before final judgment, the executor or administrator of such deceased party may, in case the cause of action survives by law, prosecute or defend any such suit to final judgment. The defendant shall answer accordingly, and the court shall hear and determine the cause and render judgment for or against the executor or administrator, as the case may require. And if such executor or administrator, having been duly served with a scire facias from the office of the clerk of the court where the suit is depending 20 days beforehand, neglects or refuses to become party to the suit, the court may render judgment against the estate of the deceased party in the same manner as if the executor or administrator had voluntarily made himself a party. The executor or administrator who becomes a party as aforesaid shall, upon motion to the court, be entitled to a continuance of the suit until the next term of said court.

"The provisions of this section shall apply to suits in equity and in admiralty as well as to suits at law, and the jurisdiction of all courts of the United States shall extend to and over executors and administrators of any party who dies before final judgment or decree appointed under the laws of any State or Territory of the United States, and such court shall have jurisdiction within two years from the date of the death of the party to the suit to issue its scire facias to executors and administrators appointed in any State or Territory of the United States which may be served in any judicial district by the marshal thereof: Provided, however, That no executor or administrator shall be made a party unless such service is made before final settlement and distribution of the estate of said deceased party to the suit."

Sec. 2. That the provisions of section 955 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by this act shall apply to suits in which any party has deceased prior to the passage of this amendatory act as well as to suits in which any party may die hereafter.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, November 21, 1921.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Dear Lord, with the birth of the morning Thou art with us, and when the stars die out Thou art still at our sides. With tender heart and quickened sense may we live this day. If chastened with deep sorrow move toward us with generous pity. In earthly work and in earthly ill take our hand, and at evening time give us sweet peace, and thus shall the distance be shortened between earth and heaven. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, November 19, 1921, was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, Mr. J. M. HOOKER, Representative elect from the fifth congressional district of Virginia, is present, and I ask that the oath of office be administered to him.

Mr. HOOKER appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH], who is unavoidably detained by illness at his home, be granted unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the conference report upon the tax bill. I would also say that if he were present he would vote for the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] be granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the conference report upon the tax bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To-day business is in order on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. The Clerk will call the first bill.

RECLAMATION LAW.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 4382, to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this bill is altogether too important to be considered at any time upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

BRIDGE ACROSS GRAND CALUMET RIVER, IND.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8347) to authorize the New York Central Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River within the corporate limits of the town of Gary, Ind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the New York Central Railroad Co., a consolidated corporation of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York, and Michigan, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Grand Calumet River within the corporate limits of the town of Gary, Lake County, Ind., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 22, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "river," insert the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

Page 2, line 2, after the word "March," strike out the figures "22" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "23."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill having been reported, the question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS WHITE RIVER, PRAIRIE COUNTY, ARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8476) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the White River, in Prairie County, Ark.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute for this bill an identical Senate bill, S. 2724, which passed the Senate on Saturday night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table an identical Senate bill, which has been messaged to the House, and substitute it for the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to Harry E. Bovay, his successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the White River, at a point where the Bankhead Highway now crosses the said river, said point being now designated as just south of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co.'s bridge, near the city of De Valls Bluff, county of Prairie, and State of Arkansas. Said bridge shall be constructed at or near such point as is most suitable to the interests of navigation and in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 23, 1906, entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters."

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OLDFIELD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the House bill, H. R. 8476, of similar title, will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS WHITE RIVER AT DES ARC, ARK.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2722) to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the White River at or near the town of Des Arc, Ark., which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the bridge authorized by the act of Congress approved February 19, 1920, to be built across the White River at or near the town of Des Arc, Ark., by Gordon N. Peay, Jr., his heirs and assigns, are hereby extended three years and six years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has an identical House bill been reported by the House committee?

Mr. OLDFIELD. No; the committee has not had time to report it out. Only two or three days ago I learned that they had not begun the construction of this bridge across the White River at Des Arc, Ark. I then introduced a bill, but the committee has not had time to report it out. I took the matter up with Senators CARAWAY and ROBINSON, of Arkansas, and they interested themselves and had the Senate bill passed, which I now ask to have considered at this time. Congress is about to adjourn, and it is important that the time for the construction of this bridge be extended, so that they can get to work upon the bridge before the bad season starts in, if it be possible.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I regret very much to object to a bill that seems to be as important as the gentleman says this is, but it is a rather unusual thing to call up a Senate bill when there has not been a similar bill reported from the House committee.

Mr. OLDFIELD. As I stated a moment ago, the committee has not had time to consider the bill. This bill, of course, formerly passed both the House and the Senate in February, 1920, but during the depression it was impossible to get the money to go on with the construction of the bridge.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. This is a bill to extend for one year the time for the completion of this bridge that has been already authorized?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. When did the gentleman from Arkansas introduce his bill?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Not more than a week ago.

Mr. MONDELL. What are the facts in respect to the matter?

Mr. OLDFIELD. In February, 1920, the Congress passed a bill permitting certain people to construct a bridge across the White River at Des Arc, Ark. At that time, as we all know, the depression started in this country, and got worse and worse, until they let the year lapse in which they could start this bridge building under the law. Now, they say they have their finances arranged so that they can begin immediately the construction of this bridge if they can get the time extended. And it has been impossible for them to do it before now. They want to get started as soon as possible, because, as I say, they have arranged for their finances.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I would like to state that I do not intend to object to this particular bill, because it seems clear our committee would report it favorably, but I want it understood that Senate bridge bills should not be brought over here and passed without the consideration of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OLDFIELD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEASE OF UNALLOTTED LANDS—FORT PECK RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8010) to authorize the leasing for mining purposes of unallotted lands on the Fort Peck Reservation, Mont.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I withhold it.

Mr. MONDELL. I was of the opinion when this bill was presented on the last unanimous-consent day that it was doubtful if it should be passed by unanimous consent. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that I have gone into the matter somewhat and I am rather inclined to the opinion that there is nothing objectionable in the bill. There are certain lands on the Fort Peck Indian Reservation that were not allotted. They think they have symptoms of oil up there. There are some folks that are willing to spend some money to develop it. Of course, if oil is developed there it will be helpful and useful to the Indians, and the matter is entirely under the control and jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior. Ordinarily on almost any other Indian reservation the unallotted lands could be leased in this way. It seems the legislation in regard to that reservation did not make that provision. Elsewhere this could be done. And it seems to me if there is anyone willing to take a chance on developing oil there we can trust the Secretary to make a lease arrangement with them that will be equitable and proper, and it will, of course, be beneficial to the Indians if there is a development there. A development of oil is an excellent thing in any event.

Mr. STAFFORD. Replying to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wyoming I wish to call his attention and the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that if we would pass this bill we would make an exception as to the leasing policy of the Government toward the development of oil on the public domain.

Mr. MONDELL. This is not the public domain; this is an Indian reservation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; unallotted lands on an Indian reservation. As I recall, as to lands that were reserved for school purposes and agency purposes, the title of them—I may be mistaken—is in the United States Government and not in the Indians.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me, the gentleman recalls that many years ago under the leadership of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] we entirely modified our policy in regard to Indian lands. We do not buy Indian lands. We have not done so for many years. We enter into an agreement with the Indians under which we agree to dispose of the lands, but the Government does not take title. The title still remains in the hands of the Indians, and anything received from the lands goes to the Indians. This is Indian land, and not Government land. It is in the same category as the unallotted lands on the Wind River Reservation in my State. That reservation, part of it, was opened 15 years ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object unless the bill goes to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the bill being passed without prejudice and going to the foot of the calendar? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ROY L. MARSTON.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution 210, for the appointment of one member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, some years ago, as I recall about three years, when the Committee on Military Affairs brought into the House recommendations for four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home, one of them was from the State of Maine. It was my privilege then to offer an amendment in the House to substitute the name of a citizen of Wisconsin, and it was carried. The bill went over to the Senate. Through the activity, the strong and urgent appeal of the Senators from Maine, they substituted a citizen from Maine and shunted aside the gentleman whom I had suggested. It came back to the House. I had been defeated for reelection. A man after having been defeated for reelection has not the same consideration in the House, as I wish to advise some of the Members here, although I hope that will not happen to any of them; but I have had that experience twice, and I can speak from experience of the influence a man has after he has been defeated. When it came back to the House I waged a fight, but it was unsuccessful. I call attention to the fact that there is a branch home in Wisconsin. Some years ago this Board of Managers was so arranged as to have a manager from each State where there was a branch home. The home in Wisconsin, which is located in Milwaukee and in the district represented by my colleague [Mr. KLECZKA], has had governors sent from outside of the State who have been guilty of gross malfeasance in office and the management of the home has been grossly neglected. We are enlarging the home in Wisconsin so as to care ultimately for the World War veterans, erecting a large hospital for tubercular World War veterans.

It is the only home that has not a representative on the board from the State where it is located. But up in Maine, the Pine Tree State, they have a few soldiers, and yet by reason of the activity of its Representatives in the House, and of its Senators in particular, they have been able to secure a representative.

I am assured by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FROTHINGHAM], who reports this bill, that shortly the Committee on Military Affairs will report a bill, introduced by my colleague, increasing the membership of this board so as to provide some representation on the board for a Wisconsin representative. Am I correct in that position?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, so far as I know the committee are in favor of having a man on this board from each of the different States where the branch hospitals are. There is a national home in Ohio and there are branch homes in various States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Permit me to correct the gentleman. They are all branch homes, although the headquarters are in Ohio. The first home was that located at Milwaukee.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. The title is "National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers."

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. But all are branch national homes. With that statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to Maine being given representation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc. That Roy L. Marston, of Maine, be, and he is hereby, appointed a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States, to fill the unexpired term of Menander Dennett, deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FROTHINGHAM, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER OF THE NORTH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8744) granting the consent of Congress to the State of North Dakota, the county of Cass and the city of Fargo, N. Dak., and the State of Minnesota, the county of Clay and the city of Moorhead, Minn., or any of them, and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River of the North at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between the cities of Fargo, N. Dak., and Moorhead, Minn.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do the hearings show that this is that part of the Red River of the North where there is water at some time in the year and no water the rest of the time? To my knowledge in years back in that great Red River of the North no water was to be found at certain times in the year. Now we are providing for a bridge across this great navigable stream—navigable for a canoe or a leaf, maybe, at certain periods of the year. Is it navigable throughout the year, or only during the flood season? Without receiving any information, I ask unanimous consent to have it passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

SPECIAL DELIVERY OF MAIL MATTER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8441) relating to special delivery of mail matter. The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under reservation of an objection, I think the bill should be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to restrict the application of the special-delivery stamp or equivalent stamps and the special service rendered in connection therewith to mail matter of the first class.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon objects. The bill is stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS GREAT PEEDEE RIVER, S. C.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2555) to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Great Pee Dee River, S. C. The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Marion and Florence of the State of South Carolina, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Great Pee Dee River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, and at or near a point known as Mars Bluff Ferry, between the counties of Marion and Florence, in the State of South Carolina, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEVENSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE SAVANNAH RIVER, S. C. AND GA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2594) authorizing the counties of Allendale, S. C., and Screven, Ga., to construct a bridge across the Savannah River, between said counties, at or near Burtons Ferry.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Allendale, S. C., and Screven, Ga., be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Savannah River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, between said counties, at or near Burtons Ferry, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair notes that the next two bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar have not been upon the calendar for three days.

REGISTRATION OF CERTAIN CHINESE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, regardless of the rule requiring bills to be on the calendar for three days, the Senate joint resolution No. 33 as amended be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 33 be considered at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I think the bill ought to be first reported before it is passed.

SPECIAL DELIVERY OF MAIL MATTER.

Mr. KETCHAM rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. KETCHAM. I ask that House bill 8441, relating to special delivery of mail matter, just stricken from the calendar, may remain on the calendar and go to the foot thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 8441 remain on the calendar and go to the foot thereof. Is there objection?

Mr. McARTHUR. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon objects.

REGISTRATION OF CERTAIN CHINESE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 33) permitting Chinese to register under certain provisions and conditions.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas 379 Chinese men, some of the merchant and others of the labor class, attached themselves to the punitive military expedition under the command of Gen. Pershing, which entered Mexico in 1916, and when said expedition returned from Mexico were temporarily admitted to the United States as refugees; and

Whereas the said Chinese performed extensive services and rendered valuable assistance to the punitive expedition in Mexico and jeopardized their lives and made their further residence in Mexico at the time impossible by attaching themselves to the expedition and rendering such services; and

Whereas the said Chinese after temporary admission to the United States as refugees continued to render and are now rendering services to the military branch of the United States Government, such services being valuable, unusual, and in some instances of a hazardous nature; and

Whereas the said Chinese can not return to their former homes in Mexico with safety and can not at this time be deported to any other place justly and humanely: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the Commissioner General of Immigration be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to permit the said Chinese to register under the terms of and in accordance with the provisions of section 6 of the act approved May 5, 1892 (27 Stats. L., p. 25), as amended by section 1 of the act approved November 3, 1893 (28 Stats. L., p. 7).

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out the preamble and all after the resolving clause and insert:

"That the Commissioner General of Immigration be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to register, and to issue an appropriate certificate showing registration to, the 365 Chinese men, now temporarily domiciled in the United States, who attached themselves to the punitive military expedition under the command of Gen. Pershing which entered Mexico in 1916, and who were brought into the United States as refugees by said expedition when it returned from Mexico.

SEC. 2. That the registration hereby provided shall correspond as nearly as circumstances permit to the registration of domiciled Chinese prescribed by section 6 of the act approved May 5, 1892 (27 Stats. L., p. 25), as amended by section 1 of the act approved November 3, 1893 (28 Stats. L., p. 7), and the certificates of registration issued to such Chinese shall constitute evidence of their right to be and remain within the United States: Provided, however, That before being registered hereunder the said Chinese shall be given the examination prescribed by the immigration act of February 5, 1917 (39 Stats. L., p. 874), with the exception of the reading test prescribed by section 3 thereof, and such of them as may be found inadmissible under said act shall not be registered hereunder, but shall be deported by the Secretary of Labor in the manner prescribed by section 19 of said immigration act: Provided further, That if any of the said Chinese shall, at any time after being registered pursuant to this resolution, become members of any of the classes for the expulsion of which provision is made in section 19 of the said immigration act, they shall be taken into custody and deported upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor in accordance with the terms of said section.

"SEC. 3. That the certificate of registration herein provided shall be issued to the said Chinese by the commissioner general without charge; and it shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, to collect any fee, gift, or remuneration for services rendered, or alleged to have been rendered, said Chinese in the procurement of such certificate or, directly or indirectly, to collect from the said Chinese any fee, gift, or remuneration for services performed in placing before Congress evidence or information on which the passage of this resolution is based; and any person who shall violate either of these provisions shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think some explanation should be made before such an important joint resolution passes the objection stage.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this legislation has been urged by Gen. Pershing and has been passed in another form by the Senate. It is right and proper for the United States to cure a situation that the United States created. We should have done it long ago. The House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization by a unanimous vote has reported the Senate joint resolution in an amended form, requiring the remaining 365 Chinese who were brought back from Mexico when the Pershing forces returned to conform to certain provisions of the immigration act—that is, to be deported if they are diseased, and so on, and providing for their deportation if they become members of the criminal classes.

These Chinese, numbering originally some 500 men, were brought into the United States about the 1st of February, 1917, by Gen. Pershing's army when he came out of Mexico. They had been picked up down there in Mexico and had performed work for our Army, and when the time came for our forces to come out it was not safe for Gen. Pershing to leave these Chinese there. He had to bring them along, and they have been in the custody of the Army ever since.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do I understand that these Chinese were in Mexico before?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. They had never been in the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They never had been in the United States. The sad part of the thing is that owing to confusion and misunderstanding we have delayed relief for four and a half years of any kind; so that we have held these men practically in a state of bondage. The activity of Gen. Pershing in their behalf did not begin until November, 1919, owing to the fact that he was, as we all know, otherwise engaged.

The Senate passed this joint resolution some time early this year, but conditions have been such that it has not been practicable to bring it before the House until now. Your Committee on Immigration have gone over the matter with great care and have had hearings which have been printed. The report tells the story. We know where these men are. They are all nominally in the custody of the War Department. The number of them is 365. If we can pass the joint resolution now the Senate will accept it at once in its amended form and we will have performed an act of right and justice.

I do not think anything more need be said.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The joint resolution having been reported, the question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The preamble was stricken out.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the title was amended to read:

Joint resolution permitting certain Chinese to register under certain provisions and conditions.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

THE REVENUE—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill on which the conference report is presented.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FORDNEY, from the committee of conference, submitted the following conference report to accompany H. R. 8245.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a motion to recommit to the conferees with instructions to the managers on the part of the House can be made, if I understand it, at the conclusion of the consideration of the conference report. Or must it be made at this time? I want to save all my rights.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion can not be made at this time. The report has not yet been read. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is entitled to the floor. The motion can be made if recognition is secured before final action on the report.

Mr. GARNER. Outside of that, if the gentleman will permit me, I do not desire to make a point of order, but I want to say to the House that I think it is the duty of the conferees—I have expressed this opinion a number of times within the last 10 years—when they come back to the House to call the attention of the House to provisions of the report that may be subject to a point of order. They ought to do that if they do not care to make the point of order themselves.

Mr. FORDNEY. There are no such provisions in the report that I know of.

Mr. GARNER. That is a matter for the House to determine. It is my duty as a conferee—

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman is asking me to express myself. I say there are none that I know of.

Mr. GARNER. I call the attention of the House to a provision that, in my judgment, and I think it was the judgment of the entire conference committee—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield pending the reading of the report?

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to ask unanimous consent that we have four hours general debate.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I will reserve all points of order on this conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas reserves all points of order on the conference report. The Clerk will read the conference report.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we have four hours of debate, one-half to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let us decide that after the statement is read. The gentleman is going to ask to have the statement read in lieu of the report?

Mr. FORDNEY. I think we can dispense with the reading of the report. It is printed in the RECORD and we can save time. We want to spend the time in debate on the bill. It is understood by the gentleman from Texas and myself that we shall have four hours general debate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to ask to dispense with the reading both of the report and the statement?

Mr. FORDNEY. To ask to dispense with the reading of the report. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we have four hours of debate on the conference report, one-half of that time to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Texas, and at the end of the four hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Four hours of debate after the reading of the report?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That does not include the time for reading the report.

Mr. FORDNEY. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that there be four hours of debate after the conclusion of the reading of the conference report, one-half of that time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. That will not interfere with my making a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And at the expiration of the four hours of debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The Chair will state that the point of order reserved by the gentleman from Texas can be made at the conclusion of the debate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. McARTHUR. I object.

The Clerk read the conference report.

[For conference report and statement see the proceedings of the House for Saturday, November 19, 1921, pp. 8014-8034.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Texas has reserved a point of order or points of order on the bill, and I think he ought to make them first.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas withdraws the reservation of the point of order. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for two hours.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, after one week's consideration by the conferees we have reached an agreement upon all of the amendments to the bill by the Senate, 833 in number. Many amendments are noted in the conference report without any explanation further than the statement that such amendments are clerical. These amendments are more form than substance. Most of them strike out quotation marks made necessary by a change in the general plan of the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As the gentleman is aware, and as all gentlemen in the House who have read the bill know, the Senate wrote the bill on an entirely different plan from what the House did.

Mr. FORDNEY. I was about to state that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And that is what necessitated these amendments.

Mr. FORDNEY. The thing that necessitated many clerical amendments was a change in the general plan of the bill. The House bill consisted of a series of amendments to existing law, while the Senate repealed existing law and wrote a complete new bill.

I will endeavor briefly to call attention to several of the major differences of substance that the conferees were called upon to decide. First, I will state the conference action on the Senate amendment affecting estate taxes. The Committee on Ways and Means in preparing the bill did not think it wise to change existing law in taxing estates, the maximum tax provided being 25 per cent. I believe, and many believe, that it would be better if estate and inheritance taxes could be left to the various States and not be interfered with by the Federal Government. I believe, as many others do, that the income taxes should be left to the Federal Government and not be interfered with by the States. The duplication of income and estate taxes by the various States and the Government causes no end of confusion and often embarrassment and hardship on the taxpayer. The double taxation on estates in many instances is excessive under existing laws. Therefore we opposed the Senate amendment, and the Senate conferees receded from the Senate provision.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand the gentleman's position upon the inheritance tax it is that the Federal Government should not levy such a tax but should leave it to the Senate?

Mr. FORDNEY. I personally believe that should be done, and, as I stated before, the matter of income tax should be left to the Federal Government.

Under instructions from the House the conferees agreed to a 50 per cent surtax. There is also carried in the bill an 8 per cent normal tax, making a total of 58 per cent imposed on individual incomes in excess of $200,000.

In addition to income taxes is the Federal estate tax running as high as 25 per cent on large incomes. On top of this the various States impose inheritance taxes, some as high as 35 per cent. I believe all of the States in the Union, with the exception of two, have an inheritance tax or an estate tax. Therefore, after the Federal Government collects income and estate taxes, the State comes in and levies similar taxes and in addition the taxpayer also has county and city or township taxes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman probably does not want that statement to go into the Record. He has mixed the income tax with the estate tax.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am referring to both.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman said that after the Government had taken 58 per cent the State would come along and take 35 per cent of what remained.

Mr. FORDNEY. I spoke of the inheritance tax and of the income tax.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman has not adopted a 58 per cent inheritance tax as yet. I hope they will adopt one of 50 per cent.

Mr. FORDNEY. Fifty-eight per cent is the income tax taken by the Federal Government, as provided in this bill. For fear that the gentleman from Texas—shrewd, sharp, keen, and cunning lawyer that he is—can not get the sense of my statement, I ask him to go back and read the Record of what I said, that some States either by an inheritance tax or an estate tax take as much as 35 per cent of what is left, and that the county taxes and city taxes impose additional tax burdens.

I do not believe in going to the extreme in taxing people. I believe that a reasonable tax upon all incomes permits money to go into the natural channels of industry, to build more factories and employ more labor and put more money into circulation. The thing that makes a country prosper is to give its people employment at remunerative wages, and it can not be done without adequate working capital.

Next I wish to refer briefly to the Senate amendment the purpose of which was to impose a tax on gifts. This the conferees thought inadvisable legislation and the Senate receded. A tax on gifts would lead to evasion by sales at less than real value, and the questioning of the motive of many bona fide sales. Under this provision the man who desires to evade the tax could do it and the man with honorable motives would be penalized. I know of one instance where a wealthy man has given $100,000,000 for a public institution at three different times, in three different amounts. I think that is going to be very beneficial, indeed, to the coming generations and to the present generation. I do not believe charitably inclined men of wealth should be made the target or that gift money should be taxed. If we should impose a tax on gifts, I believe gifts would not be made, and that those moneys would be disposed of in some other way. It is a tax on generosity, and in my opinion ill advised.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The Senate provision on gifts does not undertake to impose a tax on gifts to eleemosynary institutions and educational institutions?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I call the gentleman's attention to page 183, section 418, which specifically exempts that kind of gifts, the same as the estate tax law does.

Mr. FORDNEY. But suppose your father wanted to put you up in business and gave you more than $20,000; he is going to be taxed on account of his generosity to you. I do not think the Federal Government should tax any portion of that money.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the gentleman wish me to answer that? If the gentleman will yield to me a minute, I will answer him. We know that the estate tax is evaded, at least we are informed that it is, because men of large fortunes deliberately split up their fortunes before they die.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am sure they will split them up rather than pay them all to the Federal Government.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Furthermore, on the authority of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], when he was arguing against the Senate surtax rates, he stated that it would result in men deliberately splitting up their fortunes among their children and putting their property in trust in various ways.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is no question but they will.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If men are going to undertake deliberately to avoid the estate taxes and surtaxes, in violation of law, do you not think we should have something that will get them? And this gift tax is the only thing that will get them.

Mr. FORDNEY. A tax on gifts will not accomplish the thing for which it is proposed. It will give rise to a new form of tax evasion through the sale of property at nominal prices. It will only serve to penalize the conscientious man and will not catch the willful tax evader. It will add to the complexity, the uncertainty, and the inequalities of taxation.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is the gentleman's opinion. The Senate had a very different view of the matter. That body considered it thoroughly. The only way you can get ahead of the surtax dodger or the estate-tax dodger is by the gift tax. The Senate knew that and the gentleman ought to know it.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is the principle to which I object. Moreover, we can not now change the rates.

Mr. RAMSEYER. You could have done so by agreeing to the Senate amendment in conference, the most equitable amendment in the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. But we did not.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman from Michigan is not in favor of the gifts tax?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I am not.

Mr. GARNER. You say the gifts recently bestowed by Mr. Rockefeller in New York of $100,000,000 in three different portions is subject to this?

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not.

Mr. GARNER. You said he ought not to pay a tax on that. He does not have to pay a tax.

Mr. FORDNEY. Do not misunderstand me. I did not mean to say that the provision of the Senate was retroactive. It applies to future gifts. Suppose the same thing should happen again and Mr. Rockefeller should be giving $100,000,000. I do not want to tax it so long as it goes to the general welfare.

Mr. GARNER. And this bill does not propose to do that?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; and will not, if I can prevent it.

Now, gentlemen, the estimated internal-revenue receipts under this bill amount to $3,216,000,000, and for customs and miscellaneous receipts $672,000,000, or a total of $3,878,000,000. On August 11 the Treasury Department made an estimate of the expenditures of $4,034,000,000. A letter to the Appropriations Committee stated there would be an additional revenue of $90,000,000. Later Congress appropriated $80,000,000 for good roads, and this would lead to a further reduction in expenditures of $10,000,000; and, by the way, I have a letter on the table here from the Secretary of the Treasury stating the appropriations for roads, which I will insert as a part of my remarks for the information of the House:

NOVEMBER 10, 1921.

Hon. J. W. FORDNEY,

Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In connection with the consideration of the revenue bill (H. R. 8245) it is important to note that on November 9, 1921, the so-called good roads bill passed by the present session of Congress became a law and that under the provisions of this bill additional appropriations are made for good roads in the amount of $75,000,000, available this fiscal year, and $15,000,000 for forest roads and trails, of which $5,000,000 is made available in this fiscal year and $10,000,000 in the fiscal year 1922. The estimates of expenditures for the fiscal years 1922 and 1923 which have heretofore been submitted to the committees of Congress by the Treasury and the Bureau of the Budget in connection with the pending revenue legislation have not taken into account any expenditures under these additional appropriations. I understand that according to the most recent estimates of the Department of Agriculture, as transmitted to the Bureau of the Budget, about $20,000,000 additional will be spent on this account in the fiscal year 1922 and about $40,000,000 additional in the fiscal year 1923. These sums should be added to the estimates previously submitted of expenditures under the Department of Agriculture. On this basis the total estimated expenditures for road purposes in the fiscal year 1922 would amount to $105,000,000 and in the fiscal year 1923 to $125,000,000.

I am sending a similar letter to Senator PENROSE.

Very truly, yours,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

The estimated expenditures are $4,024,000,000. Deduct the above-stated receipts, $3,978,000,000, and it would leave an estimated deficit of $46,000,000. There is no question but many economies will be practiced and put into effect by the end of the next year, and it is quite possible, if tariff legislation is expedited by the Senate, customs collections will yield more revenue than the estimate shows. Certainly so, if industrial conditions the world over improve, and they always do under Republican administrations. [Applause on the Republican side.] Further, if desired results come from this gathering of people from all the principal countries of the world on the question of disarmament we will then have some $500,000,000 surplus from the revenues that this bill and other miscellaneous matters will raise. I think that is a fair statement of the amount that will be raised.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the gentleman to say, if there is complete success in this conference holding here in Washington—and we all want it to be complete—we will have a saving in our expenditures of $500,000,000?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; more than that.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, it is very interesting to have the gentleman say it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have seen estimates of that.

Mr. BUTLER. Can the gentleman help us a little? How can we save that?

Mr. FORDNEY. By scrapping our ships.

Mr. BUTLER. That is all right, but we do not make anything by throwing anything away. We never did. How can we save an expenditure of $500,000,000? I hope we can. Can the gentleman encourage me any?

Mr. FORDNEY. For instance, suppose, by a rough estimate, we are going to scrap or convert into some other use one-half of the Navy, we will not need as many men in the service as we now need, and the cost of operating those ships will be a very great saving indeed.

Mr. BUTLER. It costs $2,000,000 a year to run one of them. Now, let me ask the gentleman this question: The naval expenditure this year is $417,000,000. If you cut that in two it makes only $208,000,000. Where do you get the other $300,000,000?

Mr. FORDNEY. Perhaps the estimate I made was extravagant. I took it from a report which I saw the other day. It may contemplate considerable salvage.

Mr. BUTLER. Understand there was no effort on my part to criticize the gentleman.

Mr. FORDNEY. Before the war our Army cost annually $94,000,000 and our Navy $140,000,000. Last year they cost $1,500,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will there not also be an expenditure, even if we do not make these new expenditures for ships?

Mr. BUTLER. That only comes from one year.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the whole paraphernalia is cut in two, and the whole world stands by its agreement, I say, God bless the men in the conference! [Applause.]

The House bill repeals all transportation taxes. The Finance Committee report recommended a repeal of one-half of the transportation taxes this year and one-half next year, but the Senate finally passed the bill as passed by the House, so that matter was not in conference.

Then, again, there was an amendment to the beverage tax added by the Senate, in which the Senate conferees receded. The House bill amended the revenue act of 1918 by providing that on all distilled spirits on which tax is paid at the non-beverage rate of $2.20 per gallon and which are diverted to beverage purposes there shall be levied an additional tax of $4.20, to be paid by the person responsible for the diversion. The House bill also amended the existing law by providing that the process of extraction of water from high-proof spirits for the production of absolute alcohol shall not be deemed to be rectification within the meaning of the Revised Statutes, and that absolute alcohol shall not be subject to the rectification tax imposed by existing law. The Senate amendment strikes out these provisions of the House bill and inserts three new sections, the first of which imposes a tax of 60 cents per wine gallon on intoxicating malt liquors, the second of which imposes a tax of $1.20 per wine gallon upon all vinous liquors, and the third of which imposes a tax of $6.40 per proof gallon upon all distilled spirits except alcohol, the result thereof being to impose this tax upon whisky withdrawn for medicinal purposes. The amendment also inserted various modifications of administrative features of the law relating to the storage and bottling of distilled spirits. The House recedes with an amendment omitting the new matter proposed by the Senate and restoring the language of the House bill with clerical changes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Michigan has stated that the House conferees insisted on the Senate receding on that point. I hope the gentleman does not mean by that that I concurred in the proposition of throwing away that large sum of money that just as well might have been derived from liquor.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, I referred to the majority of the conferees. Let me say to my friend from Iowa that I do believe he protested against that, but the two lovable characters from south of Mason and Dixon's line, joining with two Republicans, enacted that provision in the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not see my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] here, and I fear the gentleman from Michigan does the gentleman from Mississippi an injustice.

Mr. FORDNEY. It was 3 to 2, a majority.

Mr. GARNER. Yes. But I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that he got the Senate to cut out the amendment because he put his signature to the report. He can not get away from the responsibility.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I was responsible.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will explain the responsibility. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] can not escape the responsibility. He can not escape the fact that this was put in the bill by his vote.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have stated that two Democrats went with two Republicans on the beverage question, but the gentleman from Texas corrects me and says this beloved friend of mine from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] insisted upon prohibition. Is that right? I would not do him or any other man an injustice. In fact, I should make no reference as to what took place on the part of individuals. But here we are with that provision back in the bill as it passed the House, and I hope it will be agreed to.

I have touched several of the principal points agreed upon by the House and by the Senate. I do not know that I shall go any further in my statement just at this time, unless some gentleman wishes to ask some question. But let me refer to one point I overlooked.

The House repealed the excess-profits tax, and, in addition to that, we increased the normal income tax on corporations from 10 per cent, as in the existing law, to 12½ per cent. The Senate struck out that provision and provided for 15 per cent. The Senate conferees receded, and we went back to the House provision of 12½ per cent. The excess-profits tax was not in conference, because both Houses had agreed to its repeal effective January 1, 1922.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield.

Mr. DUNBAR. While, perhaps, it is not just apropos, what good reason was there, however, for increasing the corporation tax from 10 per cent to 12½ per cent, which, by the elimination of the excess-profits tax, will increase the tax to 90 per cent of our corporations and to those corporations which are struggling for financial existence?

Mr. FORDNEY. Speaking for myself personally, I felt at all times that we should very materially reduce the tax upon corporations, because the tax on corporations in reality is upon the stockholders. The corporation is the trustee for the stockholders. That money belongs to the stockholders, and when we speak of a "corporation" we speak of an aggregation of stockholders. It must be admitted, for instance, in a single instance that I know of, that 34 per cent of all the stockholders in the great United States Steel Corporation are women, and the majority of the stockholders in the great American Sugar Refining Co. are women, largely living in the State of Massachusetts and other New England States; and when the corporation is punished by an excessive tax all you are doing is punishing your neighbor who is a stockholder in that corporation.

Mr. DUNBAR. I would like to ask the gentleman if he considers it a punishment to increase the tax on corporations that make from 3 to 12 per cent dividends?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me finish my statement. You asked a question that covers quite a wide territory.

A tax of 12½ per cent on the income of a corporation, particularly on public-utility corporations, is very severe. The railroads come in this class.

Mr. DUNBAR. How many railroads—

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me finish my statement. I say it is especially hard on the railroads of this country, which in the aggregate do not make 5 per cent on their income. Now, if you take 12½ per cent of the income of the railroads of the country, you take sixty-two and one-half one-hundredths of 1 per cent, leaving only 4.37½ per cent to the public utilities of the country. There is no way of dividing it and fixing a lower tax upon corporations with small incomes and a higher tax upon corporations with large incomes without bringing back the vexed question of invested capital.

Mr. DUNBAR. I can not understand the reason why—

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman pardon me a little further?

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. The existing law provides that incomes made prior to March 1, 1913, at which time the income tax law took effect, are not subject to the tax when distributed to the stockholders, but only profits or accumulated value of property acquired after March 1, 1913. But under existing law before profits made prior to March 1, 1913, can be distributed the more recently earned profits must be distributed subject to the tax. Then prior profits can be distributed that are not subject to taxation. Now, although the courts have sustained that provision of the law, as late as the 26th day of October, 1921, the Bureau of Internal Revenue made a ruling that certain of those profits made prior to March 1, 1913, are subject to the tax. That ruling, so it appears to me, was made in the face of the law and the decision of the courts. The only thing that that ruling does is to take a man into court and make him defend his rights—it causes litigation.

In this bill we have made it so plain that the man who runs may read, and hereafter the Government will be deterred by simple, plain language to the effect that no profits made prior to March 1, 1913, or increased value of the property up to that date, shall be subject to taxation, directly or indirectly.

Mr. DUNBAR. This bill, however, provides for taxation in the future, and I can see no reason why corporations making a small percentage of profit should be required to pay an increased tax.

Mr. FORDNEY. If you make a distinction, you must return to the perplexing question of invested capital—a question we earnestly hope to remove as a basis of taxation.

Now, gentlemen, I do not care to discuss this matter any further at present, and will ask gentlemen on the other side to use some of their time. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan reserves an hour and a half. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is recognized for two hours.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, at the very outset of my remarks I think I ought to reiterate, if I may, my personal position touching taxation, and what I believe to be the position of a great majority of the Democrats touching the same matter.

In the first place, if I understand it, there are in this country three well-defined positions concerning taxation.

One of these positions is that Congress shall levy taxes necessary to run the Government upon the masses of the people, and the advocates of this plan use as an argument that after all the whole people must pay the tax; that regardless of what method is used it finally sifts back to the masses, and consequently many who hold this view of taxation are found advocating the sales tax. It is their view that the sales tax is the simplest way of getting the money, which they say the people collectively must pay anyway in the long run.

There is another class of gentlemen who believe that all taxes necessary to run the Government should be levied on wealth, and that there should be no consumption and excise taxes, which the public in general would have to pay. These two classes I have just mentioned are the two extremes. Now, there is another class who believe that Congress should collect from the masses, and by that I mean everybody, rich and poor, learned and unlearned, great and small, according to their necessities, approximately 50 per cent of the taxes necessary to run the Government, and upon wealth the other required 50 per cent. Gentlemen who were here during the leadership of Speaker Clark will remember that he and I had a very animated discussion on the floor of the House—it may have been in caucus. I do not recollect exactly—with reference to what this division of per cent should be.

We finally agreed that the masses of the people should pay between one-third and one-half of the revenues necessary to run the Government and wealth should contribute the balance. I do not believe it would be desirable or practicable to undertake to raise all the revenue necessary to support the Government from those we ordinarily term as the "wealthy class." I have as much respect for the preservation of property rights as any man who sits in this honorable body. I would never enact any law which would take away from the citizen the incentive to accumulate wealth. I realize that capital for the most part represents the wages of yesterday, and that the wages of yesterday should be as safe from confiscation as the wages of to-day, and that we can not abolish poverty by destroying wealth; but while I would allow the citizen all reasonable opportunity and incentive to accumulate wealth, I would also enact laws which would carry a reasonable part of that fortune back to the people through an inheritance tax collected by the Treasury of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If I had my way, as I said in the original discussion on this revenue bill, I would have five taxes in this country, and we can get sufficient revenues from those five sources to run the Government. I would have, first, a customs tax; second, the post-office receipts; third, a tax on tobacco; fourth, an income tax applied to individuals and corporations; and fifth, an inheritance tax.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I prefer to go on and make my statement, but I yield.

Mr. ROSSDALE. How much tax does the gentleman think he could get above the running expenses of the Postal Department from that source?

Mr. GARNER. I would favor getting what it costs to run the Post Office Service from that source, as we have always done.

Mr. ROSSDALE. That is practically what it is now. There is probably not more than $50,000,000 spent in running the Postal Service in excess of the postal receipts.

Mr. GARNER. But, my dear sir, I would stop any deficit at all. I would do it by making each piece of mail pay its way through the mails. Is the gentleman willing to do that?

Mr. ROSSDALE. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I am very glad to hear somebody on that side of the House is willing to do that, because there was an effort made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] to repeal the second-class zone postage law.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, I think the gentleman is mistaken about that—not to repeal it.

Mr. GARNER. Your bill had for its purpose a very material modification.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; a slight modification.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; a slight modification, indeed. One that would have cost the Treasury of the United States many millions of dollars.

Now, gentlemen, proceeding further with my line of thought, I would make the income and the inheritance taxes pay one-half of the expense of running the Government. That would be wealth's contribution. And I would collect out of the customs, the tobacco, and the postal receipts the other one-half. That would be the contribution of the masses. In the payment of these last three practically everybody would contribute. By postal receipts I do not mean any new tax, but simply collect as at present for carrying the mail, except I would increase the charges on certain mail matter enough to avoid any deficit in the Postal Service.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. What will those two taxes yield to-day?

Mr. GARNER. I presume the gentleman means the inheritance and the income taxes?

Mr. MILLS. Yes; as levied under the terms of this bill.

Mr. GARNER. I expect under present conditions they will yield about $1,500,000,000. I doubt whether they will yield that much as levied under the provisions of this bill, which permits over $180,000,000 deduction, in addition to the ultimate $300,000,000 loss to the Treasury Department which I shall point out in a few minutes.

Mr. MILLS. Would the gentleman be willing to give us the estimate of the Treasury as to what would be yielded by these two taxes?

Mr. GARNER. I have not that information, and I do not think the Treasury officials have yet made their estimates under this bill; but the gentleman from New York, I have no doubt, would agree that Congress could collect out of the inheritance and income taxes from individuals and corporations very easily $1,500,000,000. In fact, during the past few years we have been collecting much more than that.

Mr. MILLS. If the gentleman will yield further, my contention is that in this bill those two taxes will yield at least 50 per cent of the total revenues which it proposes to raise.

Mr. GARNER. I do not think so, and I think the estimate of the Treasury Department, when it is available, will show that I am correct. But let me get along, if I may, because there are a great many things to discuss. It is the duty of your conference committee, Mr. Speaker, to make perfectly plain, as far as they can, the results of their conference. We passed this revenue bill first in the House and then it went to the Senate. The Senate amended it. In fact, they "muchly" amended it. In my judgment, these amendments, speaking of them as a whole, made a very much better bill out of it than when it passed the House. I think there is not a single Member who has investigated the bill who would come to any other conclusion than that it was a better bill when it left the Senate than it was when it left the House. Mr. Speaker, there is a reason for that and it is this: In the Senate the Members had an opportunity to investigate and to vote directly upon propositions of amendment to the bill. They were not tied down by a strait-jacket special rule. In the House of Representatives we had no opportunity to amend the bill, except as to such amendments as were offered by the Ways and Means Committee. Wherever the Senate had an opportunity to vote on a meritorious amendment to the bill, so far as I recall at this moment, that amendment was adopted. In view of this situation, what is the query that naturally comes to every mind? Which is the more responsive body to the people's will, the House or the Senate? It used to be said that the House was the most responsive body, gave the greatest amount of real consideration to legislation, but I submit that unless we abandon the custom of adopting these restrictive special rules, we will not much longer be able to retain that distinction. There was not an opportunity in the House of Representatives to give this bill the consideration that Members like the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and myself would like to see given.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman who now occupies the Chair [Mr. BURTON] stated the other day on the floor, and I think correctly, that this is not a deliberative body at the present time. We all concede it. The gentleman from Texas has just so stated in his remarks. Will he suggest, if not taking up too much time, what plan could be adopted, simple plan, to enlarge the rights of the House to vote on these questions? I ask that for information.

Mr. GARNER. It would take quite a little while to discuss that question, but I will say that if the House would require a two-thirds vote to adopt one of these special rules it would help a great deal. It takes a two-thirds vote of the House to suspend the rules and pass a bill. Why not require a two-thirds vote of the House to pass a special rule?

Mr. LAYTON. Does not the gentleman think that we would also have more time for real deliberation in this body if we adopted a rule that on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday there could be no words uttered except words pertinent to the bill under discussion, and that if anybody wanted to make a speech he would have to make it on Saturday?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman might get unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record and answer the same purpose. His proposition is original and novel, but I am not prepared to say it would be a wise one to adopt. But I must proceed to a further discussion of the conference report.

It is a very strange situation to me that when we came to consider amendments adopted to the bill by the Senate the Republican Senate conferees would say, "We do not want this amendment put on by our own legislative body." That is the situation in reference to the parliamentary status. You appoint conferees on the part of the House who are not in sympathy with the action of the House, or you appoint conferees on the part of the Senate that are not in sympathy with the Senate action, and the result is when the conferees get into conference and the doors are closed and the matters in disagreement are brought up you see one conferee look at the other and kind of smile, and say, "Well, you want us to recede on this?" "Well, no; we do not want you to recede on this." And thus the conference proceeds. Not a very satisfactory way, I venture to assert.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has referred to amendment No. 20, and it ought to be known as the "Fordney amendment," because if there has been a man in and out of Congress for the last eight years that has prayerfully begged and pleaded and done everything in human power to get it, you have been the one man in the United States to do so, and it ought to be known as the "Fordney amendment" for all time. I can illustrate it no better than to say that you put in the bill the provision on page—I am thinking of the old bill now—page 8, amendment No. 20, and put in there a provision which made corporations pay their just taxes, but it was stricken out in the Senate. I will not say upon whose suggestion that was done, but anyway it was done, and amendment No. 21 was put in instead.

I know when I asked the question, gentlemen, about this amendment—and you ought to observe this amendment, because it is what you would call a "mop-up" amendment by the corporations of this country—I recall how Mr. GREEN—but probably I had best leave it to him to discuss, because I know he intends to expose it when he takes the floor in debate.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman objects to the amendment so strenuously, why did he not make a point of order on it?

Mr. GARNER. Because it is not subject to a point of order. If it were subject to a point of order I would have made it. That is the difference between us. I do not want to put myself in a ridiculous attitude by making a point of order to something that is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The provisions are not the same.

Mr. GARNER. The provisions are virtually the same. I will reply to the gentleman, if he is so much opposed to the amendment, as he certainly is, why did he not make a point of order?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will answer that I want a bill at this session. I am utterly opposed to this provision No. 20. I think it is ridiculous, but I do not want to sacrifice the bill on account of it.

Mr. GARNER. Let me say with reference to the gentleman from Iowa that his ideas and mine are very much in accord in regard to policies of taxation, but there is this difference between the gentleman and myself: The gentleman from Iowa had rather let the country go to the bow-wows, and the Republican Party succeed, whereas I think the welfare of the Nation comes ahead of the fortunes of any political party. That is the difference between the gentleman from Iowa and myself. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I believe the gentleman should stand corrected. A few minutes ago he stated that amendment 20 applied to corporations alone. That is incorrect. That amendment applies to individuals as well as corporations; it applies to everybody.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, yes; No. 18 takes care of individuals. No. 18 paved the way for No. 20.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GARNER. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to report a bill from the Committee on Appropriations for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois submits a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves all points of order. The bill and report will be referred to the Union Calendar and ordered to be printed.

THE REVENUE—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, amendment No. 18 paved the way for No. 20. Members should get a copy of the bill and examine it if they wish to understand it. Even then I doubt if you will know much about it. It takes an expert to tell you what is meant by every word and every letter and every punctuation mark. It is impossible for a Member to understand these administrative features of the bill without careful study of them.

Now, I pass over an amendment that is a good one, for which I think the conferees should be commended, No. 20.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will explain No. 20 when the gentleman concludes his remarks.

Mr. GARNER. I will now consider amendment No. 8, on page 5 of the bill. I cite the page so that gentlemen desiring to follow the bill may do so. That is the only way you can consider such a bill as this. Now, as to No. 8: As you will recall, we had a discussion on it. Of course, we never had an opportunity to consider it in the House as these other amendments were considered. No. 8 undertook to exempt from taxation the foreign trader. When the expert was asked how much taxes we lose by it the astounding answer was made—I think it was a mistake—that it would be $300,000,000 a year. He based it upon all our foreign trade. But while I think he made a mistake I do know we lose a great deal of money—"a very large sum"—as the expert says. The House did exempt the foreign trader. The Senate saw the fallacy of it and amended it, and struck out what is known as the foreign trader. When we got into conference the House conferees are to be congratulated on the fact that they receded and accepted the amendment. I want to congratulate them for doing that. I want to deal with the good as well as with the bad. That is the fair way to go on as we fight our battles.

We had some other amendments. I will take them up in order. Now, as to No. 41: This is one other unconscionable amendment. Let me explain what amendment No. 41 means.

Look at it on page 12 of the new bill. Mark it. How came this amendment to be agreed to? Your conferees were in conference for a week. If they had considered these things comprehensively, they probably would have been in conference for six weeks, but it got down to the point where they said, "Agree to this," "Agree to that," "Go on," and on they went.

By the way, we had many messages from the Treasury Department. We had a Treasury expert there who came in in the morning and made a very interesting and, I thought, conclusive argument; then the Secretary of the Treasury would give him different instructions, and in the afternoon he would make the most conclusive argument on the other side of the same proposition that I ever heard in my life. This expert helped to make up this bill in the House, and when he was asked why amendment 41 was put in here, he said, that "It was thought wise at that time, but is not thought wise now." Now look at amendment 41. We had a written message on that from the Secretary of the Treasury. He said it was most important that the Senate recede from amendment 41. That is one of the seven on which the Senate receded. Out of 832 amendments the Senate receded from 7. This is one of them, and the Secretary of the Treasury said it was most important that the conferees do that. Now, what is the office of amendment 41? By it you determine gain or loss; this is the definition of how you will determine gain or loss; determine how much you will make, you know.

It reads:

When any such property held for investment or for productive use in trade or business (not including stock in trade or other property held primarily for sale) is exchanged for property of a like kind or use—

You do not get any gain or profit there. The Senate saw the fallacy of that. They saw you could exchange stocks and everything of that kind without paying any tax at all, so they struck out "investment or for," and left it reading—which is all right. Then you should have no profit or gain. Now, the Senate struck that out because they did not want it to apply to stocks and bonds. What happened? The Senate receded. Why, it happened just as it always will as long as the Treasury Department has the viewpoint of taxation that it now has. That will happen as long as you have a House or a Senate that obeys the mandates of the Treasury Department. It is the viewpoint of those who desire to relieve the heavy taxpayer from his taxes and continue the taxes upon the masses of the people, as they have done in this bill. You will find it all the way through, and these are only a few things that I can point out to you, because I have not the time to point them all out. As I say, it would take you five or six or a dozen hours to explain with anything like fullness the effect of these various amendments, which you do not understand, and of which neither I nor any other member of the conference committee have but a limited understanding.

When any such property held for productive use in trade or business (not including stock in trade or other property held primarily for sale) is exchanged for property of a like kind or use—

Amendment 114 is one which is known in the Senate as the Lenroot amendment. What did Mr. LENROOT do? He wanted to protect the Government against this effort on the part of the House, whose theory of taxation was that you should relieve the big taxpayers from taxes and let the masses of the people pay the taxes. He wanted to protect them as far as he could by this particular amendment. Senator LENROOT put in the words "or stock or shares in a corporation." This part of the bill was to make an exception of a certain kind of property from certain taxes, and Mr. LENROOT put in "or stock or shares in a corporation" so as to catch that bunch. Now, what did they do? They struck that out. If you will remember, that is one other place, one of the seven cases, where the Senate receded. You have already had one stock-and-bond amendment where the Senate receded upon the urgent request of the Secretary of the Treasury, and here on the Lenroot amendment you have the Senate receding again, because that amendment applies to stocks and bonds. That is natural, and in perfect harmony with Republican history and tradition.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. In just a moment. That is natural. There are three Republican conferees on the part of the Senate. Picture them in your eye, if you will, stand-pat Republicans, three on the House side, two stand-pat Republicans and the other not aggressive enough in contending for his views on this bill. It is easy to understand just how such recessions come about. Now I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLS. I should like to ask my friend if he will tell us why the net gains on the sale of capital assets consisting of stocks and bonds should be taxed at the full rate, while the sale of other capital assets should be taxed at a limited rate? Why should there be a difference in the taxation on the profit? What is the distinction between stocks and bonds as property and other property?

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the gentleman that there is no great difference so far as this particular amendment is concerned, but I merely mention this to show you that wherever the House left out an opportunity for them to get away the Senate put it in, and then the Senate receded. That is all. I am merely illustrating the practice.

But now take amendment 115. Here is the juicy one. Here is where my 95 Republican friends who voted with us to accept the 50 per cent surtax got it in the neck. Here is where you thought you were getting 50 per cent and the conferees took it away from you. Now, let us see what happened by adopting amendment No. 115. You voted for 50 per cent the other day as a surtax on incomes amounting to over $200,000. What is the condition? What happened? Under the present law some of these large income-tax payers have to pay 73 per cent, 65 per cent as surtax and 8 per cent as normal tax, and under this provision, making a distinction as to income derived from capital gain, the taxpayer will not be taxed more than 12½ per cent.

Such are the fruits of putting this bill in the hands of conferees not in sympathy with the expressed will of the House.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa rose.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, when I get to telling an unpleasant truth the gentleman interrupts me. Wait until I get to something else; I decline to yield. I know how difficult it is for Republicans when their leaders put it up to them to vote for or against a conference report. I am going to point out to you, I think, that when you vote for this conference report you are voting for something that you do not want. You voted the other day that the man who had an income of over $200,000 should pay a tax at the rate of 58 per cent, 50 per cent surtax and 8 per cent normal tax. The same taxpayer may have under this amendment an income of $500,000, and if it is from capital stock gain the internal revenue department can not tax him more than 12½ per cent.

But there is one good feature in that amendment, which ought not to go by without my telling the House the effect of it. In agreeing to this amendment we increase the capital-gain tax paid by corporations from 6 per cent to 12½. You all know what capital gain is. The capital-gain corporations will be increased from 6 under the old law to 12½ under this amendment. The House provision did not apply to corporations.

Now I yield to the gentlemen who desire to ask a question.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARNER. Very well.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I want to ask if the original bill as it passed the House does not carry practically the same provisions.

Mr. GARNER. The House provision limited it to losses as well as gains. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). Forty-eight minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Well, I have so many amendments that I would like to call attention to that I will not have time to refer to all; but I will call attention to a few more. Amendment 168, you gentlemen are all interested in that and have had telegrams about it. You want to look at that in connection with 395. What is this amendment?

This provision relieves the national banks. This amendment exempts the national banks of the country from the payment of local taxes, or rather allows them to include it in the expenses and deduction from their returns. I am not particularly opposed to it, but I merely call your attention to the fact once more and again and again, that every effort has been made toward relieving those best able to pay and continuing the tax on those least able to pay. I merely call attention to these facts that you may see the trend of opinion existing in the minds of the conferees of both Houses.

When I come to the soda-water tax, and those other little nuisance taxes, I shall undertake to show you that the conferees contended with tenacious insistence on keeping the very highest rates they could get in a compromise measure.

I refer now to amendment No. 793, and what I have to say in respect to that applies to a number of the amendments. They have pursued a policy in this bill that I think is a mistake, and I am going to tell you about it. I do not believe that we ought to place in one man's hands too much power; I do not care whether he is a Republican or a Democrat. I am fundamentally opposed to placing in one man's hands too much power over the purse or the person of the people of this country. In the delegation of power, I think the least power you place in the hands of the administrators beyond what is necessary, the better it is. What has happened? In a number of instances they have turned over to the commissioner the most astounding power that has ever been placed in any one man's hands. They take away from the Comptroller General the power to determine the legality of a voucher coming through his department. They take away from the comptroller—and I wish the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] was here, because he was on the Budget Committee and we discussed this, and I know his opinion—they take away from the Comptroller General under the Budget System power to say to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, "You have issued a voucher in defiance of law." Do you wish to do that? I know that the Old Roman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] does not want to do that. I know his opinion in respect to these matters. But that is what this bill does. It takes away from the Secretary of the Treasury, from the comptroller, the power to say to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, "This voucher is issued in defiance of law."

If you pass this bill, you have turned over to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue very broad power to deal with literally billions of dollars. Do you want to do that? I say you do not want to confer any such broad powers, and I do not believe this House would tolerate it for a moment if it had a chance to vote upon the question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We did not take that power away from him because he did not have it, and we did not give it to him in this bill. The Auditor of the Treasury can still say whether a voucher is improperly drawn, as well as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman's statement refutes itself. Is there any gentleman here who knows of any law or provision of law that permits a man to draw a voucher against the Treasury that is not based on law? If he does, let him name it. This does it. This leaves the whole thing in his power to do as he pleases.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman does not mean that.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, the gentleman from Iowa gets 10 per cent information on the subject, and then swears that he knows more than anybody else on the face of God's green footstool. It beats anything I ever saw in my life.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I did not know any more than that, I would keep still.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What reason, if any, was given for taking that power to determine the legality of a voucher away from the comptroller?

Mr. GARNER. The advocates of the idea said there were so many technical claims that had to be considered one way or the other that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue wanted to close them up. They wanted to give him the power to fix it here and fix it there—how much?—to fix it to suit himself.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There seems to be a conflict of testimony here. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] says that is not the reason at all.

Mr. GARNER. If the construction that I place upon that is not correct—that is to say, that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue can draw a voucher against the Treasury of the United States and have it cashed in defiance of the decision of the Comptroller General—then I am unable to understand the English language and do not know what words mean.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I had always supposed that it was the exclusive function of the Comptroller General to decide questions of law.

Mr. GARNER. I suggest to the gentleman that he read the amendment and form his own conclusions.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. What amendment is that?

Mr. GARNER. Seven hundred and ninety-three, to be found on page 290.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I would say that I do not see how any gentleman can differ with the conclusion reached by the gentleman from Texas. It is in haec verba.

Mr. GARNER. It is there. I submit it to any gentleman; he can find it out for himself on investigation. If it were not so, I would not be calling it to the attention of the House.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman take a minute to explain to us what became of the agricultural bloc in the Senate on this bill?

Mr. GARNER. I shall repeat what one of the Senate conferees said, and from my imitation of him gentlemen can probably imagine to whom I refer, without my mentioning his name. He said, "Why, you have not adopted a single one of the agricultural bloc amendments. Don't you know that you are going to have trouble when you go back to the Senate?" No. Not a single one did they adopt. They put the kibosh on them as fast as they came to them, and they had the diligent assistance of everyone on the Republican side of the conference, except the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] who, I repeat, said, "Well, we have got to have a bill, and I am with the party." I glory in his spunk. He stands with the party, if the country does have to stumble along.

Let us take now amendment No. 354, to which I desire to call attention while passing. That amendment permits a partnership or an individual to incorporate within four months after this becomes a law, if it will give him a lower tax. Such a proposition seems to me to be wholly indefensible.

Gentlemen are more or less familiar with amendment No. 355. This is the Senate amendment which struck out the provisions of the House bill levying a corporation tax of 12½ per cent and inserted in lieu thereof a tax of 15 per cent. The conferees have agreed to recede from the Senate amendment and accept the House rate of 12½ per cent. Let me say with reference to this reduction that I should also have called your attention to some other reductions—reductions in this bill over what it carried when it passed the Senate—and in the Senate it was a reduction over what it carried when it passed the House; in all amounting to $180,000,000, as I get the figures.

That is the best information I can get by asking questions of the Treasury Department expert who makes these estimates. I do not believe this House wants to run the Government on credit. I know you do not. This bill under present expenditure will, in my judgment, lack from $600,000,000 to $700,000,000 of sufficient money to run the Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas has consumed one hour.

Mr. GARNER. If the result of the Limitation of Armament Conference now in progress in Washington enables us to make heavy reductions in Government expenditures, we may have money enough with which to run the Government. But I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], if the Committee on Appropriations is called upon to make appropriations according to the present scale of expenditures, the Government will lack $600,000,000 or $700,000,000 in getting money enough to meet these expenditures. I do not believe the House wants to do that. The result of cutting down this corporation tax, as provided in the Senate bill, from 15 to 12½ per cent is more than satisfactory. It ought never to have been increased from 10 to 12½, but you were compelled to do it at that time in order to get by with your excess-profits tax and thus relieve the big corporations. You never would have increased it for one moment—you probably would have reduced it—but you had to bid somewhere, somehow, in order to get sufficient votes to repeal the excess-profits tax.

One of the most influential men in the Republican Party said within the last 72 hours that he had rather see the excess profits stay in the bill a thousand times than to see you adopt the surtaxes which the House of Representatives adopted the other day. Of course he had, because under Republican administration there is not going to be any such thing as an excess-profits tax. It will be gone. But you will continue to have men in this country who have immense incomes and they will have to pay the surtaxes. So this prominent Republican, who occupies a place at the other end of the Capitol, said from his soul—as I know he spoke it—that he would rather ten times have an excess-profits tax than to have a provision in the surtax such as the House placed in it the other day.

I will now refer to amendment No. 406.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARNER. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Have you in your mind how many will be affected by the excess-profits tax in the United States?

Mr. GARNER. I have not the slightest idea.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Are there any in the gentleman's district that he can think of?

Mr. GARNER. I know there are a number of statesmen who occupy a place in the House of Representatives who never can see any proposition outside of their districts. It is fortunate they never get in control of the Government.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. The gentleman said that the surtax is repealed in this bill, and now he says this distinguished man would rather have had the excess-profits tax remain than for the surtax to be kept at 50 per cent.

Mr. GARNER. My dear sir, you know that your party promised during the elections last year to cut the surtaxes 25 per cent, and you also promised to repeal the excess-profits tax. Your party could not do it. It had promised too much. You could not comply with those promises and get money to run the Government without increasing the corporation tax very materially. Well, are you going to do it? Are we going to-day to increase the tax on all corporations in this country making only 10 or 15 per cent, and some of them much less than that, and let off the ones that are rich, making heavy and large percentages? The result of this conference is that they compromise. What is the compromise? To repeal the excess-profits tax, cut down the surtaxes from 65 to 32, and increase the corporation tax 2½ per cent. There is a compromise between these interests. It was to put on the "poor devil," such as my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] often cries out in lamentation and for whom his tears are shed, whether it be a municipal corporation or other corporation that did not make any war profits; you are going to put on them 2½ per cent more this year than you did last, and at the same time relieve some of those who have been making the heaviest profits by taking off the excess-profits tax. There is your compromise. You have put on every corporation in the United States 2½ per cent additional in order that you might release those who made immense profits.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARNER. I yield to my friend.

Mr. KEARNS. When the war was on and the Democratic Congress was here, was not this excessive tax put on the big inheritances at that time?

Mr. GARNER. Why, Mr. Speaker, when a man gets up and asks why you did this and that and the other during times of war—

Mr. KEARNS. I asked you why you did not.

Mr. GARNER (continuing). During the war I stood on this floor as a Democrat and, in response to my administration's request, voted for measures which I would not ordinarily support in time of peace. Some of these measures I could enumerate, but it is not necessary now.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman has not answered my question. When the war was on and the Democratic Party was in power in both branches of Congress at that time, when we were needing money badly, why was not that high tax put on these large inheritance estates at that time?

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman allow me to come to the estate tax in the regular order?

Mr. KEARNS. I thought the gentleman was discussing it.

Mr. GARNER. No; I was not discussing that tax at this particular time. I was talking about corporation taxes. I repeat it here, and I do not want you gentlemen to forget it, the compromise the Republicans made with the corporations of this country was to repeal the excess-profits tax and to reduce the surtaxes to the extent of 25 per cent, and place the surtaxes at 32 per cent, and to levy a flat tax of 12½ per cent on all corporations.

That was the compromise. Now they have the 12½ per cent on corporations, but instead of the 32 per cent maximum surtax, as they contemplated, we have the 50 per cent by virtue of the patriotism of a majority of the membership of the House of Representatives. Amendment No. 406 is the amortization section. That applies to 1918 and 1919, but for fear that some good man would get away, for fear that some Republican would not get what was coming to him, they extended it to 1917. I call your attention to this in passing.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman means 1920 and 1921?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; 1920 and 1921.

Now turn to amendment 440, if you will, on page 107 in the new bill. The principal amendment is on page 107 in this bill. I want to commend it. As I said, I want to refer both to the good and the bad. Here is an amendment that sought information. Here is a policy that the majority of your conferees did not believe in. They do not want information. Mark that statement. I will prove it by this bill that they did not want information. But this amendment will provide for some information, and I want to commend the conferees, and especially the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], who, I think, contributed to it, because he suggested that amendment to the amendment which was adopted. I want to commend him for the suggestion he made. He deserves the thanks of the House, because he is the one who held out for it; otherwise we would not have gotten a single amendment in here to get information. They have cut out two others.

The next amendment I will call your attention to is along that line. Look at amendment 536, on page 138. It provides that income-tax returns shall be public records. Why didn't the language remain in the bill? Do you know any reason?

One of the provisions of the bill is:

But they shall be open to inspection only upon order of the President and under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary and approved by the President, or at the request of either House of Congress.

This provision also proposed to give you the information desired at the request of either House of Congress. The conferees strike it out. Why did they strike it out? I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] why he agreed to strike this amendment out? I will tell you why they struck it out. I will tell you the express reason why, and when I say "they," I refer to the conferees. They were not willing to trust either the House or the Senate, and they said so by their action in striking this provision out.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. Sisson. Does the gentleman believe that that provision would be binding upon any future Congress?

Mr. GARNER. Well, if we should leave this provision in the bill and subsequently the House passes a resolution requesting such information and the Secretary of the Treasury declines to comply with it, he would be in plain violation of the law; but if it is not in here and goes out, as this conference report provides, then if we pass a resolution requesting such information he can ignore it. That is the difference, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. Sisson. I have investigated it. I hope the gentleman is right about it; that one Congress can not bind the next Congress so that it could not right a wrong done by a former Congress.

Mr. GARNER. The conferees on the part of the House did not want this information to be available. That illustrates the frame of mind those gentlemen were in when they were acting as your conferees.

Mr. FORDNEY. Did the gentleman from Texas want that in?

Mr. GARNER. I did.

Mr. FORDNEY. Why did you not put in the law of 1918?

Mr. GARNER. I did not think of it, or I would have done it.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I do.

Mr. Sisson. There is a great deal in this proposition, so far as either House is concerned. It would take a law to do it. But without this provision the House alone could pass a resolution demanding the information, and so could the Senate; so that this is a protection of the officer who may be doing wrong against an investigation by one body when the other body does not agree. I believe that the House ought to have the right to get the information, and I believe the Senate ought to have the right to get it.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. I hope the gentleman will state, if he knows, whether the gentlemen of the House who engaged in the conference were influenced by the 10,000,000 votes cast last year by people who wanted less interference in business by Government and more business management in Government?

Mr. GARNER. Oh, yes; President Harding started out and said that he wanted less Government in business and more business in Government. What have you done to secure that since you got in? [Applause on the Democratic side.] You have been here since April 11, and you have not done a thing to take the Government out of business.

Mr. CLOUSE. Does not the gentleman think, now, that when we pass this bill, as we are certain to do to-day, we are providing for a method of doing business to the people of America?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; you are; the most monstrous style of doing business ever attempted in the United States. It has been said that this is the most monstrous piece of economic legislation ever placed upon the statute books of this country in time of peace. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLOUSE. I have been much interested in the presentation of the argument of the gentleman from Texas, and I would like to know now—and I have not been able to gather it from his remarks—whether the gentleman now stands in favor of higher taxes as they now exist under the original bill that originated under a Democratic Congress in 1918?

Mr. GARNER. Let me say to my friend, as between this bill and the war measure which the Democrats enacted, I prefer the war measure.

Mr. CLOUSE. I was not asking that question.

Mr. GARNER. Hold on. That is what the gentleman asked me. I will tell you the reason why. The war measure is in time of peace indefensible as a tax measure, and would never have been placed on the statute books except in case of an emergency. You Republicans voted for it. Yes; you did. You youngsters may not have voted for it, because you were not here, but everybody who was here voted for the war tax measures. Now, what happened? We hastily, as the patriotic representatives of 100,000,000 people in war, passed tax legislation which it was not expected to continue when the war was over.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GARNER. I decline to yield. We passed those laws. You joined us patriotically in passing them. But the war came to an end. The time has now come when we must pass sound and economic permanent peace policy tax legislation. The country gave you the power to perform that duty, but you are sadly lacking in your efforts to carry it out.

You are pretending to do it, but it is only a hollow pretense, and I say to you frankly that in my judgment there is more equity and more justice in the war laws that we passed hastily than there is in this monstrous piece of tax legislation which you are offering to the country as the permanent peace policy of the Republican Party. It is no secret that a certain Senator, a very influential one in his party, remarked, "This is a monstrous piece of legislation." I said, "When do you intend to repeal it?" He said, "Next year." You have been working for seven or eight months with a majority membership of 300 to a Democratic minority of 130 in the House of Representatives, with the second richest man in the world as your adviser, and you get up a piece of legislation that one of the most intelligent if not the most intelligent Senator your party has declares must be repealed within a twelvemonth. Ah, that is statesmanship on the part of the party which has been claiming such wonderful efficiency in government.

Amendment 622 is the gift tax. I do not intend to discuss that. It is well understood, probably, by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]. He was the originator of it, and I never will forget the time when the conferees came to that part of the bill. His face bore that beaming smile that is always there, indicating his good Christian character. His lips were just a little wider than usual and he said, "You will have to agree to this." I said, "Good for GREEN. By jingo, he is going to put that one over on these hard-boiled conferees sure." Well, they passed it over, and then again they passed it over, and still yet again, and we finally got down to where there was nothing left except the liquor tax and the gift tax, and the gentleman from Iowa had to give them both up. I opposed him on one, but I supported him on the other. I supported him in his contention for the gift tax. I will let the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] explain to you the merits of that, because I know his thoughts are full of it.

Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], do not try to avoid responsibility for the elimination of the gift amendment. You ought to have the courage to stand up and say to the whole world, "If I had had backbone enough, I could have kept that amendment in the bill." You could have done it if you had wanted to, and you ought to say you could have done it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Perhaps I have not got the kind of a backbone that the gentleman from Texas has, but if he thinks that this is the last of the gift tax let me assure my friend from Texas that he will hear from it again, and let him defeat it again if he can. He can not do it the next time.

Mr. GARNER. Well, speaking about the next time puts me in mind of something. Every time we came up against something like the gift tax or the inheritance tax in conference, and my friend from Iowa wanted them, they said, "Oh, put them on the bonus bill; we will put them on the bonus bill. We will give you that tax when we pass the bonus bill." Our Republican friends are going to have the liquor tax put on the bonus bill; they are going to have the increased inheritance tax put on the bonus bill; and they are going to have the gift tax put on the bonus bill. It may be so, but it is plain and certain that you are going to have the sales tax on it. [Laughter.]

That is the only one you will have. But now, when they want this conference report adopted, they go to the gentleman from Iowa and say, "You want the gift tax? Well, we will put it on the bonus bill if you will give us the sales tax." That is going to be the policy in the bonus bill. That is what they did with Mr. GREEN to get him to agree. All you had to do was to say, "You want my signature; you have got to have it?" "Yes; we want it." "Well, you recede and agree to this gift tax in the bill."

Now, we come from gift tax and liquor to soda pop. [Laughter.] You will find that on page 195, where there are a number of these amendments. Let me show you a funny thing done by the conferees. We wrestled with this thing for an hour and a half, trying to agree on something between 7½ and 10 per cent. The question was, What will we do with the soda-water tax?

Finally the conference agreed to put it at 9 cents. We had the hardest fight about that one little amendment that you ever saw, but when it comes to taking $110,000,000 off the corporations they said, "Well, let her go; pass on, John. Call the next number." [Laughter.]

Now, take amendment 710, page 224, in the new bill. I want to call attention to it for a moment to let you see again the policy of the conferees. The provision reads:

Sec. 902. That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon sculpture, paintings, statuary, art porcelains, and bronzes, sold by any person other than the artist, a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which so sold. This section shall not apply to the sale of any such article (1) to an educational institution or public art museum.

And then comes the amendment—or (2) by any dealer in such articles to another dealer in such articles for resale.

That means that you will lose about $5,000,000 by these wash sales not being taxed.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 24 minutes remaining.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I can not go through the list of these amendments that I have here because I do want to devote a moment or two to the main matter. I could go through this list and call attention to one or two amendments that I think should be called attention to, because a few days ago—

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman enumerate the amendments he had intended to refer to?

Mr. GARNER. Amendments No. 722, 766—and they refer to the loaning and returning of stocks. I asked the expert to give me an estimate on the loss this involved, and he said that he could not do it now, but that it would be a large amount.

Amendments numbered 799, 804—and I want the attention of you gentlemen on the Judiciary Committee for a moment to that. Here is where the Committee on Ways and Means changes the law relating to limitation of time on prosecutions. Some time ago Congress passed a law making the time limitation three years in respect to certain violations of law during war times. Another law was passed making it six years. The Ways and Means Committee has made it three years. I am informed that the Judiciary Committee bill does not apply to internal-revenue cases, but it applies to all other cases. I do not think Congress should fix any short limitation against these fellows who violated the war contracts law. Amendment No. 707 entails a loss of a million and a half per annum, and amendment 825 clearly illustrates the Treasury methods. The conferees undertake to enact in this bill, at the suggestion of the Treasury Department, rules and regulations of the Treasury Department that have been made and that heretofore have not been put into law. It seems to me most unwise to burden this bill down with a great load of cumbersome rules and regulations.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman concludes there will he yield for a question?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Was there a Senate amendment which provided that the taxpayer should include in his return a statement of his tax-exempt securities?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Was that stricken out?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Why?

Mr. GARNER. Because the Republicans did not want to get that information until they can get the sales tax on the statute books, and they give that as an excuse for advocating the sales tax.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have asked the question because in the debates here recently we have had a great deal of conjecture as to the extent to which the ultra wealthy men of the country have invested in tax-exempt securities. The design of the Senate amendment, as I understand it, was to furnish definite statistics and information on that point.

Mr. GARNER. That is correct, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] wanted to have it put in there, too, but it was not put in.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. This information was required by the tax blanks and is being required now.

Mr. GARNER. The statement was made this way by the Treasury experts. They said that the law required it now, but that it has no teeth in it. The result is that the lawyers advising the big taxpayers advise them not to pay any attention to that law, that it does not amount to anything. We wanted to put it in there and put some teeth in it, but the boys said, "Nay, nay; not at all; nothing doing."

Mr. Speaker, as I said in the beginning, this is a very feeble effort toward explaining some of the amendments in this bill. I said it would take 6, 8, or 10 hours, and I repeat that it would take some one with an understanding better than I have to explain the bill fully. There are many provisions in the bill which only experts can interpret. I thought we would try in peace times to enact legislation that the ordinary citizen could understand, but I see no hope for that in this bill. No one but a lawyer, an economic expert, a bookkeeper, or an accountant can understand it, and when you go home you will be unable to make out your own report. You have heard Congress criticized a number of times for passing a law under which a Member of Congress could not make out his own return. When this bill goes on the statute books I undertake to say that not 10 per cent of the membership of the House who have any business transactions whatever of a commercial nature will be able correctly to make out their own return.

But there is one thing that you can understand, and there is one thing that your constituents are going to be able to understand, and that is, they are going to understand your vote this afternoon on the question of whether you want large estates taxed more than they are taxed now. There will be no way to camouflage on that matter. You can not dodge when they ask you why it is that you are not willing to take 30 per cent from a man who inherits an estate of $15,000,000.

Gentlemen, do as you please. I know in your hearts that scores of you do not like this bill. You know that it is a monstrous piece of legislation, but many of you are going to vote for it on party grounds. But before you reach that stage you have a right to perfect this piece of legislation and make it as near your idea of what it ought to be as it can be made; and so let me appeal to you as one American to another, outside of politics, because men who stand for making wealth pay its full share are not necessarily Republicans or Democrats—I appeal to you to perfect this measure as near as you can before the final vote. I am going to make a motion, or some other gentleman will before this bill is finally voted on, to send it back to conference with instructions to the conferees on the part of the House that they agree to the Senate amendment pertaining to estate taxes.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARNER. In just a moment. Now, do you believe in those estate taxes? If you believe in the Senate amendments in reference to estate taxes, let it go to conference to-morrow, have it put in this bill, and we will pass it within an hour after it arrives from conference. It is a question, gentlemen, of whether you want it in the law. If you do, you have a chance to get it, because by voting for such instructions as I have mentioned you will have a bill reported back with an agreement to the Senate bill within an hour or two hours to-morrow and can then pass the bill. And I hope that Congress will adjourn on the 23d so that we can all return to our homes. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I had forgotten. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MILLS. I wanted to ask the gentleman how high he thought the inheritance tax rates should go?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I know that there are gentlemen in this country that would not take over a million or five millions or ten million dollars. I am not one of them. I would go far enough to say that when a man in this country with $100,000,000 dies, and I think that amount is more than one man ought to own—leaves $100,000,000, which a good Government permitted him to accumulate by his efforts, whether fair or unfair, during his lifetime, I would say to his heirs, who never earned one dollar of it, "The Government permits you to take $50,000,000 that you did not earn, and therefore you will give up the other $50,000,000 to the Government for the benefit of the people. That is what I would do. I do not know that I would go higher than that. I do not think I would. I think 50 per cent is as high as the Government ought to go. Would the gentleman from New York take any by the Federal Government?"

Mr. MILLS. Not without due consideration. The gentleman said he would take 50 per cent of $100,000,000, and I assume he fixes $100,000,000 for the purposes of illustration.

Mr. GARNER. Of illustration.

Mr. MILLS. When he takes 50 per cent by the Federal Government he is actually, in any number of cases, taking 80 per cent from the heirs, because to-day all but three States of the Union have inheritance tax laws, and most of them run up as high as 30 per cent on estates of more than $100,000,000.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman confirms my argument that every State in the Union likes this kind of taxation and the people of the country want it. We are standing in the way of their wishes by the argument he makes. The facts he uses show that every State in the Union wants that tax. I will tell you how I would fix an estate tax. I would put a provision in this bill, if I had my way, about the rates that I have mentioned, providing that where a State did not collect an estate tax 50 per cent of the amount collected would be returned to the State. Then you would not have a single State in the Union that would not have an inheritance tax.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman, then, would have a maximum of 50 per cent of an inheritance tax on the large amount?

Mr. GARNER. On the large amount; yes, sir.

Mr. MILLS. Does the gentleman appreciate, then, in asking the Members of the House to vote for the 50 per cent tax that he is asking them to vote for 80 per cent?

Mr. GARNER. The State of New York can repeal the taxes if it wants to do so.

Mr. MILLS. Let me ask the gentleman another question: Is he not aware that not only is a man taxed in the State where he resides, but in a number of cases he is taxed by three or four States?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. Does the gentleman think it sound and equitable to pay taxes in three States, and then superimpose this tax?

Mr. LONDON. When one man owns property in three or four States it means that he has American citizens working in three or four States under the protection of three or four States?

Mr. GARNER. That is probably true. I know this, as well as I know that I am standing here, that if the Republican leaders had given us an opportunity to consider this bill under the ordinary 5-minute rule and Mr. GREEN of Iowa had risen in his place—as I believe he would have—and offered this Senate amendment relating to inheritance taxes to the bill it would have been adopted. The leaders did not give us a chance. This is the only chance to get it in the bill. Take it or leave it alone. I have made my argument and the responsibility must now rest with the political party in control of the House.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. I am in favor of a high inheritance tax, but this bothers me, namely, how are you going to prevent the distribution of the estate beforehand?

Mr. GARNER. Just as quick as the Democrats get in we can attend to that part of it. We will fix a good strong gift tax. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman reserves seven minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas has consumed nearly two hours, most of the time lamenting the fact that we have not placed upon this bill in time of peace taxes his party declined to place upon their bill in time of war. If the taxes that the gentleman from Texas is so bewailing the absence of in this measure are so meritorious, so altogether commendable, why in thunder did they not place them on the tax bill his party presented in time of war and stress, when they were reaching out in every direction for every dollar obtainable? In a portion of the gentleman's time, when he was not lamenting the fact that we had not placed upon this bill taxes which they declined to place any one of the several tax bills passed during the Wilson administration, he was endeavoring to give a definition of other folks' idea of the proper theory of taxation.

I did not hear all of the gentleman's two-hour speech, but the part that I did hear did not give me any clear or definite information of what the gentleman's own notion was as to the proper basis or theory of taxation. He talks about presenting all these matters under the five-minute rule, open the report to amendment, and all that. This conference report comes here in the usual way. It comes here under the rules of the House—rules that were in operation for eight years under the late Democratic administration, with no proposal to change them.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I regret I can not. My time is short. If I had as much time as the gentleman from Texas had, I would be glad to yield.

I think it is unfortunate that we can not open tax and tariff bills to full debate in the House, but everybody knows why we can not, because in our opinion—it is merely an opinion, which may not be well based; but it is an opinion that I hold firmly and one which is justified by many votes and all the procedure on that side—there would not be a single, solitary vote cast on the Democratic side on any question relating to such a bill save and solely votes cast from the standpoint of partisan politics. I know—we all know—that there are gentlemen on the Democratic side who do not believe that a 50 per cent surtax is sound economically as a tax proposition in time of peace, and yet the party lash was swung, and gentlemen who had said they were going to vote against the 50 per cent surtax voted for it. There were three votes, I believe, cast on that side against the 50 per cent surtax; those were honorable exceptions. I make one further exception. There is, in my opinion, one individual who sits and votes on that side that on a question of this kind would cast his vote on the merits of the proposition as he understands them. That is the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON]. I believe he would vote his convictions on these questions; he would probably be wrong, but at any rate his vote would express his real opinion. I may be doing some gentleman an injustice, but it is my opinion that the votes on that side on any amendment to this report would reflect not the belief or the opinion of gentlemen on that side, but solely and wholly the opinion of the leaders as to the votes and attitude that would secure them the greatest party advantage. Of course, they would be mistaken, even from that standpoint.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Their votes are not sound, even from the standpoint of party advantage; but that is the way they would be cast, in my opinion. It is, of course, all a matter of opinion. I would be glad to yield, but my time is very brief.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What does the gentleman think of the 90 per cent of the vote cast on that proposition on that side?

Mr. MONDELL. I think in the main those on this side who voted with the gentleman from Tennessee on Tuesday last did so from the standpoint of misguided opinion. [Applause.] I do not criticize men for voting wrong from errors of judgment. I may not enjoy it; I may not approve it. But it is quite a different thing when gentlemen vote wrong not from conviction, but because they hope it will be of some party advantage.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] endeavored to outline and diagram the basis of our views on this side as to the proper philosophy of taxation. He got about as far wrong as a man ever did in the world. I am unable to tell by your votes what your theory is on that side as to the proper theory of taxation, but I do know that on this side we believe that taxes ought to be laid on the basis of the ability of the taxpayer to pay, and that all taxes laid on property and income should be in proportion to the property and the income, and in the case of income taxes increases progressively with the size of the income.

There is, of course, ground for difference of opinion as to just how we should adjust the detail of taxes on the basis and theory I have suggested. That is the viewpoint of the Republican side, and I hope it is the viewpoint of the Democratic side, although one would scarcely judge so from their votes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what have the conferees agreed upon? Just what is the effect of their action? If this conference report is adopted, we shall reduce the burden of taxation on the American people for this calendar year $70,000,000. I wish it were more. I wish we could have relieved the tax on these soda fountains, where my boys and girls buy soda water, right away. I wish we could take the trying and vexatious stamp taxes off to-day. But we can not do it to-day. We propose to do it January 1 next.

But we have repealed $70,000,000 of the burden for this year. From whom have we lifted this burden? We have relieved the fathers and mothers of the land and those caring for dependent relatives. We have encouraged those with families and those caring for relatives, relieving the burden upon them in the sum of $30,000,000 by increasing the exemption from income tax for each such dependent in the sum of $200. We have relieved heads of families with incomes not over $5,000 in the sum of $500 exemption each, and to the tune of $40,000,000. All of the load lifted this calendar year is lifted on account of children and dependents, and from heads of families having salaries less than $5,000 a year. That certainly is a good beginning.

Beginning next January we do better, because then we take off the transportation taxes to the tune of $270,000,000. We lift $25,000,000 of taxes from ice cream cones and soda water and soft drinks. We lift the taxes from articles of wearing apparel to the amount of $18,000,000.

Beginning January 1 we shall no longer tax parcel-post packages, and the people will save $20,000,000 during the year thereby. We shall encourage the fathers to provide for their families by relieving them of an annual tax burden of $20,000,000 per annum on insurance policies, and we shall relieve the children from eight millions of taxes on candy.

No more shall the small boy and youth pay Uncle Sam four million a year on baseballs and footballs and baseball bats. Daughter can now have a Victrola and brother a mandolin without helping to pay a $12,000,000 tax on musical instruments. We may have electric fans in summer and furs in winter without helping to pay Uncle Sam $300,000 in one case and $9,000,000 in the other. Sister Sue is no longer to be taxed on her face powder or her chewing gum, and brother Bill no longer is to be taxed on his toilet or shaving soap.

The gentlemen who have been assisting the committee in the preparation of the bill and advising them, from expert knowledge, as to the revenue to be expected under its provision have been good enough to prepare me a table of the amounts by which the taxes are to be lifted by this bill. They estimate the tax lifting and revenue reduction this calendar year as follows:

In the next calendar year, the year beginning January 1 next, we shall lift the burden from the shoulders of the American people in the sum of $835,000,000. By reason of the passage of this bill the people of America will pay in the next calendar year less Federal taxes than they would have paid, except for this bill, by $835,000,000—a very goodly beginning, let me suggest; and, of course, this is not the end of tax revision. When our expenditures are smaller, as we get further away from the war, we shall be able to lift the burden to a greater extent all along the line.

If we had reduced the surtax to 32 per cent, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], judging from what he said to-day, with a 50 per cent surtax in the bill, would have found no words sufficient to express his condemnation of the bill. According to his statement it is altogether bad. Yet the surtax, the item on which there was the greatest contest, is exactly what he wanted; it is at the point for which he voted, and yet he will vote against the bill. I agree with him on one thing. I think a 50 per cent surtax in time of peace is most extraordinary. I will admit that, and that far I will agree with my friend from Texas. But with that exception, which I think is of doubtful wisdom—with all due deference to my friends on this side who think differently—this bill is a splendid measure. It is not perfect. There never will be a tax bill that is perfect until we have one whose provisions are zero, for no one admires to pay taxes, and I know of no tax levy that is welcome anywhere. But this bill does make a good start with the ice cream cones and soft drinks, and relieves our people from many trying, vexatious, and burdensome taxes. Uncle Sam will no longer stand hat in hand begging pennies from little children and sweet girl graduates around the soda fountains. There will be less stamp licking in the Nation, thank heaven, and the burden will be lifted to the tune of $835,000,000. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to discuss this bill generally. I feel, however, that I ought to call attention to one thing—the amendment of the Senate taxing intoxicating liquor. Perhaps I may be excused for speaking on that subject. I feel that the House conferees, in disagreeing to the amendment, threw away an opportunity that I believe they ought to have embraced for the purpose of relieving our people from other taxes. The tax proposed in that amendment was a very important one, still one that could have been borne readily, and against which there could be no valid objection. That tax would have amounted to something like $50,000,000 to $60,000,000. I secured the figures from the Treasury Department to learn just how much liquor was consumed last year. From these I gather that the amendment would add $40,000,000 to the tax on spirituous liquor and $17,000,000 on vinous liquor, or a total of $57,000,000. Those who manufacture medical preparations would practically not be affected, as they use alcohol on which the tax would not be charged.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The information that the committee had was that it would amount to $20,000,000.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I can give the gentleman the figures, and he can figure it out for himself. It is clear to me that that tax could have been enforced. The liquor sought to be reached by it could easily have been distinguished from the alcohol that was to pay a less tax because the system provided under the national prohibition act is such that it could have been checked up so as to determine whether alcohol or some other liquor was used for the purpose of filling prescriptions.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; I can not. There has been a good deal said in reference to this particular amendment. It has been contended that it would place a hardship upon those using alcohol in the manufacture of medicine.

There is nothing to that contention, because for medicinal purposes strictly speaking the tax would have remained at its present figure, $2.20; that is, on alcohol used for that purpose.

For the purpose of filling liquor prescriptions it was intended that liquor suitable for beverage purposes and not alcohol should be furnished, and we should insist that such liquor be furnished under the law. On liquor suitable for beverage purposes, when prescribed for medicinal use, the Senate amendment made the tax $6.40. To this I can see no good objection. What is the situation? Let us be perfectly frank. The liquor that is sold on a prescription is only very rarely sold for medicinal purposes. We might as well recognize that fact because it is true. The provision for selling liquor on prescription was intended to, in some measure, relax the general prohibition. Some people believe they must have liquor, and this permits the sale, but when we permit it we should want the liquor that is prescribed to be pure. If you had imposed this tax of $6.40 on that kind of liquor, we could have insisted on securing decent liquor, instead of what is now being sold; very often it is nothing but diluted alcohol. At the extravagant prices charged by the druggists the addition of 55 cents in taxes on a prescription could hardly have justified him in raising his prices, and he would make profiteer prices even if he paid it.

Another thing. There was as a part of that same amendment a provision which would have given us better control of the distillery warehouses. I can see no reason or excuse for insisting that bottling in bond must only take place in a distillery bonded warehouse, as under the present law. It might as well take place in a general bonded warehouse. By accepting that amendment we could have concentrated the liquor in large warehouses and could have cleaned up a lot of little distillery warehouses scattered all over the country that are now greatly endangering enforcement of the law. I am not insisting on high taxes on liquor, but I want this House to know just what your conferees have done. They had a chance to have imposed this tax in place of some of the more obnoxious taxes and to have aided in law enforcement. They refused to do so, and instead of defending what they did are apologizing for it. My friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] can not be said to defend his action. The fact that he has voted for the prohibition laws makes his action if anything less defensible, and the claim that he did not want to vote for it, because he claims that it was drawn by some outsider, is not creditable as an excuse.

I do not want to take up more of your time. I simply wanted to call your attention to the situation. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota yields back three minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, to my mind the most important proposition that has come out of this whole discussion on the revenue bill relates to the way in which we legislate. I am frank to say that no man can talk upon this bill with less than a half hour or an hour at his disposal, so I will address myself only to the lack of legislative consideration which we give to important measures like this great revenue bill. We are confronted with a bill containing over 300 pages, and we have had only one chance to vote for a single amendment since the bill was reported by the committee. Over in the Senate they had the bill under consideration for two months and the Senate adopted 833 amendments, many of them nominal, but some of the greatest importance and over 100 record votes were had by that body. I wanted to vote on the Senate inheritance tax amendment, but no opportunity is offered. That is the reason why I am compelled to vote with those who make a motion to recommit, for it is the only opportunity I will have to place myself on record in favor of an inheritance tax. The most important duty in this House is to provide some system by which we can vote and act intelligently, by which we can legislate deliberately, and that we are not now doing. The procedure of to-day is purely committee legislation and legislation in conference. Not one amendment has been put in this bill except that on the surtax. All the rest of the bill is the product of the committee or of the conference. I am not going to discuss that subject further, but we owe it to ourselves to correct these indefensible methods of legislation. I want to say that I shall vote for the bill, but for a different reason than that ascribed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. I believe the bill is far better than the old law that is now in existence. It takes away many of the objectionable taxes, reduces tax burdens placed on the country during war, and will give some needed relief. It is not what I would like, by any means, and ought to be amended, but it is a great deal better than the old law.

There is another matter that I wish to speak of briefly. Criticisms have been offered against 94 Republicans because we helped pass the Senate surtax amendment. There is no party control recognized by me, and never will be, that violates my own judgment on purely right business legislation. I am going to vote according to my best judgment whenever opportunity affords on all economic propositions. It has been stated in some of the metropolitan papers that came to my desk this morning that we have opposed the President. I have never criticized the President, even indirectly, but I did feel that it was unfair of those in the House who procured the letter, and so stated. I feel that the President was misled. That is the unfortunate part of it—to present a letter from the Executive at the last moment, and to me it is not a wise method of securing legislation.

Gentlemen on this side of the aisle asked why I voted for the 50 per cent surtax the other day. I voted, gentlemen, with 96 United States Senators, Republicans and Democrats alike, who are recorded as accepting that rate without opposition; there is no partisanship there; Republicans and Democrats supported the 50 per cent rate in the Senate. They discussed it day after day and finally agreed on that rate; they were unanimous. The Senate rate saves $40,000,000 to the Treasury that will continue to be paid by multimillionaires and not by those least able to pay. I so voted. In view of criticisms, I wish to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting a telegram that I have received.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by inserting a telegram. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I object.

Mr. FREAR. Then I will read it.

Mr. Speaker, here is a telegram which I will read in response to criticisms coming from metropolitan papers of New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. FREAR. This is the telegram from the governor of my State, who must have learned of the vote through the press:

MADISON, WIS., November 18, 1921.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The people of Wisconsin will heartily approve of the action of the Wisconsin delegation in their fight for the 50 per cent surtax. I congratulate you. I hope you will be equally successful in passing the soldiers' compensation bill without the imposition of a consumption tax.

JOHN J. BLAINE, Governor.

This is my reply:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 19, 1921.

Gov. JOHN J. BLAINE,

Madison, Wis.:

Your good message conveyed to our Representatives. The Wisconsin delegation turned the tide against the infamous dye embargo, which was defeated by a close vote in the permanent tariff bill this session. Soon afterwards the delegation in a close vote helped defeat the repeal of the excess-profits tax and high surtaxes for 1921, involving over a half billion dollars of revenues, and this week the delegation helped send to defeat a frantic effort to cut in half the maximum surtaxes on great wealth. Last session, by a close vote in Republican conference, the Wisconsin delegation defeated the sales tax in the soldiers' compensation bill that passed the House, but died in the Senate. I agree with you it would be a sad commentary for Congress to give a half billion dollars to railway security holders with one hand and cut down a half billion dollars in annual taxes on wealth with the other, and then permit ex-service men, in recognition of their sacrifice, to pay themselves a small Government compensation through consumption taxes laid on their own families. That is not the Wisconsin idea.

JAMES A. FREAR.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I will occupy but a short time. I want to answer the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. The gentleman criticized me severely for amendments 18, 19, and 20. What he said was that I had worked in season and out of season for just what is in this bill in these three amendments. Let me tell you what they mean. No law ever existed, no law will be put on the statute books now or later, permitting Uncle Sam to go back to 1913 and tax profits made prior to that time, no matter when they are distributed. [Applause.] The amendment the gentleman would vote for would practically do this. If a person owns stock in a corporation and was the original purchaser before March, 1913, and held that stock until liquidation came, there would be no tax on the profits made prior to 1913. But if the man should die and the stock go to his wife and children, then it has changed hands and will be subject to the tax. Or, if he transferred it to anybody, it would be subject to a tax. That is the general proposition. Congress, by constitutional amendment, acquired the right to tax incomes on March 1, 1913. The courts have consistently held that Congress has not the power to tax profits accrued prior to that date. In this bill I do not favor the attempt to do indirectly what can not be done directly. It simply invites litigation. It drags the taxpayer into court, and the only result will be expense to the taxpayer and to the Government.

The gentleman complains about our taxing the people. The Democratic administration fooled away more than $4,000,000,000 in endeavoring to force Government ownership on the people of this country in regard to the railroads. We are obliged to raise money to pay off your debts. Your administration spent $55,000,000 building a shipyard at Hog Island. It was well named. You turned that property over to a corporation with $2,000 capital and gave them cost-plus contracts and paid them $11,000,000 profit for two years. We have to pay the bills. Hog Island is undisposed of and the Government is ready to sell it and desires any man to make an offer for it, but nobody is fool enough to do it. [Laughter.] Another thing. President Wilson had placed at his disposal $100,000,000 to use as a secret fund. He transferred by the war provision $50,000,000, spent it, asked for more, and was refused. We have slight knowledge of how that money was expended. We are paying those debts, and we are compelled to exact taxes from the people now to get money to pay for the money the Democratic administration fooled away at Muscle Shoals and over into West Virginia and around about Toledo, Ohio, in building factories and spending money like drunken sailors, and never producing a single pound of explosives—spending over $200,000,000 in those plants. Those debts are here now over our heads, and we must pay those debts and will. Every item in the bill carries a reduction, and you are kicking like a half-dead steer because we are raising some money now. What do you want? Do you want us to increase the taxes? We have decreased the taxes a billion and a quarter this year, and if the good people of the country, guided by the good Lord, let the Republican Party remain in power another year, as I hope and believe they will, we will still further reduce the taxes. But, my friends, we voted with you to appropriate money during the war, and we placed money at the disposal of your administration with the understanding among ourselves that if the administration did not judiciously use the money, the Republican Party would not be responsible for it. We voted for all that was asked for by the administration to efficiently assist it in carrying on and winning the war. We stood solidly with you in giving President Wilson everything that he asked for, and now you criticize us for raising the money to pay these debts.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have no more time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I shall occupy all of the time allotted to me, but I feel I ought to say just a word or two as a member of the committee on conference in explanation of my attitude on this conference report. I say with perfect frankness that I signed the report and intend to support it without any very great degree of enthusiasm. The main trouble about the bill is that, instead of being a bill based on science, it is a bill based largely on politics, and both sides of this House must share in that responsibility. I do not regard the bill as carrying out, in spirit at least, the declarations of either the Republican or the Democratic platform. I shall read just a sentence from each.

The Republican platform declared:

But sound policy equally demands the early accomplishment of that real reduction of the tax burden which may be achieved by substituting simple for complex tax laws, and procedure, prompt, and certain determination of the tax liability for delay and uncertainty, tax laws which do not for tax laws which do excessively mulct the consumer or needlessly repress enterprise and thrift.

I do not think we on this side are carrying out in full spirit that pledge. I think the other side of the House has offended even more grievously against their platform, which was more specific than ours, because it said:

We advocate tax reform and a searching revision of the war revenue acts to fit peace conditions so that the wealth of the Nation may not be withdrawn from productive enterprise and diverted to wasteful or non-productive expenditure.

I say that my friends on the Democratic side of the House have offended even more grievously than we against their pledge to the American people. In my humble judgment laws which in time of peace take away more than half a man's profits are not laws which encourage or even permit capital to be invested in great productive enterprise. It is idle to discuss now whether rich men ought to refrain from withdrawing their capital from productive enterprise to place it where it can not be taxed; but they do that very thing, and there is no possible way to prevent it.

The only possible way to do so would be to enact legislation which will tax these exempt securities, but the Constitution forbids. When the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and I and others were making up the 1918 revenue bill, in which we sought to raise $8,000,000,000, more than twice the amount this bill contemplates raising, we tentatively placed there a tax on State, county, and municipal securities hereafter issued. When that was referred to the Department of Justice, however, the opinion was expressed that it was wholly and absolutely unconstitutional. The only way that we can encourage money to be invested in industry, which will employ labor, which will furnish a stable market to the farmer for the products of his farm, is by making such a bargain, if you please, with capital as will induce it to seek investment in those channels. I think that the taxes are now too high for that purpose. It has been the universal experience of all countries in the world in time of peace that you can not take away at the outside more than one-third of a man's income and have him refrain from seeking to put it where you can not tax it at all. That may be unpatriotic upon his part in a sense, but it is human nature, and, as I said the other day, we have to deal with human nature in making tax laws, because there is no definite, scientific basis for assessing taxes. The best taxes are those which do not tax those least able to pay, but which raise the necessary revenue with the least objection from the taxpayers.

This bill was very badly made in another body. I think our procedure was very much more scientific and proper. As the gentleman from Texas said, there were a number of amendments placed in the bill in the Senate to which a majority of the Members were opposed, and frequently when I myself asked why a certain amendment was inserted, the reply was heard, "Oh, well, it went in at 2 o'clock in the morning and we wanted to prevent Senator So-and-so from making a speech."

I do not blame them for wanting to prevent in some cases some Senators in the Senate or some gentlemen in another legislative body from making long speeches, but that is a very poor excuse for piling tremendous burdens upon the already overburdened shoulders of the American taxpayer.

I do not defend this proposition as a permanent solution of the tax problem in this country. I do not defend it as a permanent system of raising taxes to pay in the next few years for our greatly increased cost of government. I defend it merely because in my judgment it is a very advanced improvement on existing tax laws. Even if it had made no changes in the direction of somewhat lightening the burdens upon both the producer and the consumer, I firmly believe that the administrative provisions that have been placed in the law, largely at the suggestion of gentlemen in the Treasury Department, experts who have been administering it, will so greatly simplify our present laws as to be of very great advantage to both the Government and the taxpayers.

There are a number of cases in which the burdens of the taxpayer are very substantially lessened. They are lessened in some respects, though I do not think sufficiently so, to the payer of the higher income taxes. They are lessened very substantially to the payer of the very small taxes. The exemption is increased from $2,000 to $2,500 and the allowance for minor children doubled, and in other respects it is going to be for the benefit of the small income taxpayer.

I have not time to go through the bill, as did the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], amendment by amendment; I might criticize some of his arguments against amendments which he criticized. The trouble with the gentleman from Texas is that nine-tenths of the amendments which he criticized he himself voted for in conference.

I want to say just a word before I close on the final argument of the gentleman from Texas, directed to gentlemen on this side of the House, with the purpose, as he himself has boastfully avowed a number of times, of "driving in a wedge" which would separate us into factions. He wants you to vote to double the present inheritance tax. Now, gentlemen, if my friend was perfectly sincere he would have answered the question of the gentleman from Michigan a little more in detail. The gentleman from Texas had a very prominent part in the making of the 1918 revenue bill, designed to raise in time of war more than $8,000,000,000. If he has been, as he says, always an advocate of 50 per cent taxes on estates, why did he not put them in then, when the country was at war? Why does he wait until three years after, when the country is at peace, to double the taxes which he declined to vote for in time of war? Do you think he is making that argument to benefit you, gentlemen? He is doing it for the precisely opposite purpose "of driving in the wedge."

But even if this is a bona fide statement of my friend, he did not answer the question proposed to him by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS], who pointed out that if we should vote here for a tax of 50 per cent by Federal law on the larger estates, as a matter of fact, under the State laws estates are being taxed in addition anywhere from 10 to 35 per cent. There are a number of States which tax inheritances 30 to 35 per cent. So the consequence would be that instead of having a 50 per cent tax you would have an 85 per cent tax.

You would leave but 15 per cent of the estate after it got in the hands of the devisees, and no man, least of all the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]—I do not doubt even the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON]—would advocate the taking of 85 per cent away from those inheriting estates.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is the gentleman altogether accurate when he says, adding the two figures together, 50 and 35—I do not know of any State that has 35—

Mr. LONGWORTH. The State of Arkansas and others.

Mr. RAMSEYER. But there it is graduated, so that even if it were 35, it would leave more than 15 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not want to split hairs on the exact mathematical percentage. The proposition is to take, probably, as much as 75 per cent of an estate. Now, if that was justified in time of war, it is not justified in time of peace. I am not going into a lengthy argument as to the effect it might have on business conditions generally. If a number of great estates had to suddenly dump securities on the market, the result might be disastrous. But I am merely warning my colleagues again, as I have warned them repeatedly, against listening to the advice of my very good friend from Texas. He does not mean you well. He is the most efficient wedge driver that has sat on that side of the House—I will pay him that compliment—since I have been here. Just ask yourselves the question, though, whether you are going to be controlled by the advice of a gentleman who when in time of war $8,000,000,000 had to be raised refused to tax inheritances more than 25 per cent, proposes now to tax them at double that amount.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 12 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I was called from the Chamber during the time that the gentleman from Michigan was making his first address to the House upon this conference report, and consequently did not have the opportunity of hearing him, and I would like to ask now, if I may, whether or not the gentleman during that time read a letter from the President of the United States?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not this time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I presume not. Mr. Speaker, if one did not know, one would surmise, from the attitude of the gentleman from Wyoming and the gentleman from Michigan, that they must have recently suffered some sort of a disappointment. Ordinarily sunny, pleasant, and genial, to-day we find them grouchy, not cordial, unyielding. I wonder what could possibly have come over the spirit of their dreams that has created this unpleasant attitude toward this innocent and long-suffering House? Some of the gentlemen said the other day that the President of the United States had been badly advised. I think that is true. I think the gentleman from Wyoming and the gentleman from Michigan were badly advised, else they never would have led their party to the point where it would have received, upon the very head of its leader himself, that terrific and crushing blow which fell with such force a few days ago. And I am speaking of that in order to warn you for the future.

You are going to have another opportunity here this afternoon to do a thing that is right. You had best take advantage of the first opportunity that is presented. Had gentlemen upon that side of the House taken advantage of the opportunity which was offered them in the first instance, when a motion was made upon this side of the Chamber to instruct the conferees, the party leader, not only here, but the head of the administration, would not have been to-day in the unfortunate situation in which they find themselves. I could have advised the President of the United States better than the gentleman from Wyoming or the gentleman from Michigan advised him, but he did not consult me. I could have advised them, because I had some vision of what was to come. "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets and stonest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not!" [Laughter.]

Now, an opportunity is going to be offered to you, as I said, to do another right thing, to vote upon this inheritance tax and meet the emergent conditions of the country.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has already explained how, in part, the faith with this House and the Senate has been broken by the insertion of amendment numbered 115 of this bill which materially modifies, and in a way that no person supporting it in this House expected, the surtax and the way it is imposed. They have now another opportunity to meet the emergent conditions confronting the country growing out of the war, and we shall shortly have an opportunity to deal with that by casting a vote for the Senate amendment for a large inheritance tax; and as a protection to yourselves, and in order to prevent a recurrence of that unfortunate condition which now confronts you and your party, I would venture to suggest that you vote right this time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I ask you to listen to me while I state what is in this bill and not what is not in the bill; while I ask support of the principles of Americanism and not the principles of socialism; while I talk to you with reference to what money we need and not simply about levying taxes for the sake of taxing the rich, and injuring business in the meantime.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] saw fit to criticize my courage in a legislative way because I am unwilling to follow him with reference to the bill before the House. To the Members on this side I have no need to enter any defense, and I shall not. I will only say this, that if I had made a speech in favor of a tariff bill and then had lost my courage so that I withdrew it and took it out of the Record; if I had voted in favor of that tariff bill and then on a subsequent occasion voted against that tariff bill, as the gentleman from Texas did, I would not be talking about the legislative courage of anybody. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But that, Mr. Speaker, after all, is a mere matter of pleasantries between myself and the gentleman from Texas. Neither of us cares for those things, and you gentlemen are only, in the tedium and hard work of this House, willing to listen to it for just a moment, for we both know that it has nothing to do with the measure that is before us. There is, however, a more serious matter connected with the talk which the gentleman from Texas gave you. Some time ago, in some previous remarks, I could not avoid saying that this was the day of the demagogue. It is the day when some men preach what they do not believe; when they go out and tell people things that they have no faith in; when they light the fires of discontent and hatred, which may some time, some day, burn down the elegant mansion of such men as the gentleman from Texas himself. And let me say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], the sole Representative and leader of the Socialist Party, "Mr. LONDON, you must look to your laurels or they will be taken from you by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]." He has been preaching socialism with every word he has uttered here to-day, when he told you that we ought to put on taxes here and keep taxes there solely for the purpose of taxing the rich. If a tax hit the rich that was enough for him.

Did he deny that those taxes are unfair or unjust that we take off? No. He made no such claim; not for a moment. He simply said that they were laid upon the rich; that the rich would have to pay them; that the rich had stocks and did not have farms.

And so he got up here and told you that here was a trick in this bill whereby a man that held stocks, if he held them for two years for investment purposes and sold them, would pay only 12½ per cent on his capital gain, and he said that was an outrage, because the rich generally held stocks and the rich would have to pay that. Why, the gentleman from Texas even intimated that the conferees changed the bill so as to make the tax on profit derived from capital sales 12½ per cent in order to nullify the effect of the income-tax provision that we voted for the other day. The fact is that this was substantially the provision that was contained in the House bill as it first passed this body, and no one objected to it then. What we struck out from the Senate bill was a provision that would make a business man pay a higher tax on profit derived from sales of stock that had been held more than two years for investment than was paid by a farmer on the sale of a farm or by anyone else on sales of other property held for use or investment.

Now, that kind of an argument may appeal to the Non-Partisan League of North Dakota. It may appeal to some of the I. W. Ws. But it ought not to appeal to sensible or thinking men for a moment. There is no reason in the world, if we limit the tax sales of capital to 12½ per cent, why it should not apply to all kinds of capital equally. The gentleman from Texas said it was in order that that man who had made a half a million dollars profit should not have to pay these high surtaxes. Not at all. That amendment was put in there because we found that the Government was not getting anything worth mentioning from transactions of that kind. Men would not sell their property and pay such heavy taxes. I brought into this House about a year and a half ago a bill containing the same kind of a provision in principle, and every man in this House, without exception, supported it, and it went over to the Senate unanimously. But it is nothing to the gentleman from Texas when he wants to make a political speech that he has heretofore supported the very kind of a provision that he is now attacking.

The gentleman from Texas says now that he is going to bring in a motion to recommit this bill on the inheritance tax. Mr. Speaker, in a great work written by a famous writer, called "Pilgrim's Progress," there is a character well described by his name, Mr. Facing Bothways. The name is hardly adequate for the gentleman from Texas on these revenue propositions, because it would be necessary to have something that would describe him as facing in half a dozen different ways, for he has shifted his position so often that nobody can keep track of him. He appeals to those on the Republican side to vote for this inheritance tax, which he does not believe in himself, which he has always opposed, which he must admit is not drawn in proper form. It should not be forgotten that the proposition as to whether the inheritance tax should be carried to higher rates was brought up at a time when we were passing the revenue bill of 1918 and the Democratic Party was in power. It should not be forgotten that at that time they called upon every washerwoman and ever section hand and every policeman and brakeman to dig up their pennies and contribute to the Government in order that we could carry it on, and that they then said that the inheritance tax ought not to be increased. And now, in times of peace, the gentleman from Texas comes in here and seeks to assume the leadership of our side and drag its members into support of a proposition which he himself has often condemned and denounced. Why, gentlemen on the Republican side, what has the gentleman from Texas said with reference to this? What does he believe? He believes that a tax levied in the manner that it is levied on inheritances in this amendment is simply a monstrosity, because it takes no account of State taxes. It makes no allowance for the amount that may be taken by the State. It makes no provision against even the greater part of the estate being taken.

Does the gentleman from Texas know the amount taken by the different States in addition to the Federal taxes? Of course he does, but he does not care when he is making a political speech. Does he not believe that some provision ought to be made for such cases instead of levying the rates without making any allowance for the State taxes in the manner of the provision he seeks to have adopted? Of course he does, but he does not care when he is making a political speech. Does he not know that the State taxes and Federal taxes together under the plan he advocates in some instances would take so large a portion of the estate that at forced sale the whole estate might be absorbed? Of course, he knows this, but he does not care if he can arouse prejudice and discontent. Does he not know that in order to raise sufficient revenues the States will more and more be compelled to look to the inheritance tax, and that if the National Government takes the highest amount possible it takes more than its share? Of course, he does, and if his own party were in power he would not think of supporting the proposition for increased inheritance taxes in the form which we must take it if we take it at all. Do you think, my friends, that we have to follow him on this proposition, that he himself does not believe in, that he has so often condemned, and now seeks to have us adopt as a half-baked estate or inheritance tax because it is to be paid by the rich?

But there is another reason why we should not adopt this inheritance amendment at this time. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was entirely wrong in his figures with reference to the amount raised by this bill being sufficient to meet the expenditures of the Government. The latest figures that I have been able to obtain from the department show that while there may be a deficit of $40,000,000, that does not take into account the situation with reference to the good roads fund for which all of us on the committee think allowance has been made before. Somebody down at the Treasury thinks it has not been included. I do not think we need further money to carry on the Government as the situation now stands. Are we to levy taxes now just for the sake of putting taxes on somebody, or are we to redeem the pledge that the Republican Party made that it would reduce taxes?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. On the question of the amount that this bill will raise, I am very much interested in this proposition, whether the levy under this bill, together with our existing tariff law and other sources of revenue, will furnish sufficient revenue to meet the expenses of the Government and also take care of the sinking fund of the national debt? Have the conferees made estimates, or have experts made estimates along that line, as to whether the receipts under this bill, together with the receipts under the existing law, will be sufficient to meet the expenditures of the Government?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In response to the question of my colleague, which I am very glad to answer, I will state that this morning I got from the Treasury experts a statement of the amounts which this bill will produce for the fiscal year 1922, for the next calendar year, and also for the year following that. When I say that it will produce money enough to run the Government, I am speaking of this fiscal year and the next calendar year. Beyond that I expect, and I believe all of us have reason to expect, that there will be large reductions made at that time. I certainly know of some very large expenses that will have to be paid this year which will not have to be repeated. Now, the statement which was made by the experts was that the bill was about $40,000,000 short of the necessary amount which would be required to carry on the Government. In saying that, however, they took into consideration the expenditure of $100,000,000 for the road fund, which I have reason to believe had heretofore entered into their calculation. But in any event, I do not believe that the full amount will be expended even during the next calendar year, and I believe that the bill will produce sufficient funds to run the Government.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And also to take care of the sinking fund?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And also to take care of the sinking fund. I want to say, however, in that connection, while I think of it, that I propose—I may require two-thirds of this House to go with me, but I propose to put back that liquor tax at the earliest possible moment if I can get sufficient support. That will produce somewhere from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Am I right in assuming that if this Senate amendment were adopted it would be an increase of the estate taxes over and above the present law?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, yes; a very large increase over the present law passed by our Democratic friends.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If that is so it is a direct violation of the pledges of both parties, is it not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It seems to me that it is, except as an actual necessity may arise. I want to mention one other matter in connection with the estate taxes right there. Let us grant that we have an opportunity to raise some further funds from estate taxation. Let us grant that we could obtain a very substantial sum. I hear on every hand that we are going to have a bonus bill next session. The gentleman from Michigan so stated, and if we do not have one then we will have one later. Where are we going to get the money if we bring in this bill everything that we can put on? If there is anything more that can be got out of the estate tax, and I think there is if properly drawn, I want to use it for the bonus bill. I want to do the same thing with the provisions in relation to gifts, which I hope to see incorporated into the law, although in a different form than it was in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Could not some be gotten from the foreign loans?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman will get nothing from the foreign loans to apply in this direction the next year, whatever we may get some time in the future.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They might get something out of interest.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They may, and I hope they will; but I have no real encouragement to offer in that line.

Now, let me go a little more particularly into the provisions of the bill. What have we got here that should authorize our Democratic friends to condemn it so vigorously as drawn in the interest of the rich? All great measures are the result of compromise. There are some compromises in this bill—too much, I thought, and some others thought so. But if we had not compromised, we would not have had a bill, and a bill we must have at this time. While there are defects in the bill, I maintain that a better tax bill was never presented to any country.

Mr. Speaker, in all this broad world, notwithstanding the talk of the gentleman from Texas about how we are not taxing the rich but taxing the poor—in all this broad world there is not a spot where the masses will be taxed so little as in this country. [Applause.] Why, Mr. Speaker, under this bill the great mass pay no Federal tax unless they go to the picture show and pay the admission. I am speaking of the average man with a family. The liberality of the provisions which we have made in this bill will astonish the rest of the world. A man in England has to pay an income tax on $600 a year. In other countries he has to pay tax after tax in the way of consumption taxes. We have absolutely freed the people of the United States of any kind of a consumption tax by this bill. There is nothing in the way of a consumption tax in this measure. Any man who goes to market to buy clothes for his family, shoes for his children, buys them without paying a Federal tax upon them. And yet they say we are taxing the poor and not taxing the rich. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] wants to look to his laurels when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] takes the floor, for he can outdo even socialist leaders in talking socialism. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Texas said he would get half of this fund that he needed from the corporations and the income tax. We do. I have not the time to go into the figures, but that is the fact, and that is what we do under this bill.

In making up this bill we have increased the exemption of heads of families whose income does not exceed $5,000 to $2,500, and we have increased the allowance for children from $200 to $400. We have taken off the tax on freight; we have taken off the tax on passenger fares and express; we have taken off the tax on parcel post; we have taken off the tax on furs; we have taken off the tax on all of that long list of articles sold at the ordinary retail store and bought by rich and poor alike; we have taken off the tax on ice-cream cones of the children; we have taken off all the nuisance taxes; we have taken off all these taxes—taxes that aggregated over $500,000,000—and yet they tell us that we have done nothing for the common people.

Gentlemen, I want to tell you that in all the operations of this committee, as far as I am concerned, I have stood unflinchingly, working for what I thought was for the interest of the whole country, and I know that neither I nor any other member of the committee wanted to oppress the masses by taxation, but, on the contrary, we insisted all the time that the great mass of the people should be free from Federal taxation.

Now, what have we done for business? I am aware that some business men are complaining, looking at the matter in a somewhat different light than I do. I want to discuss this matter for a few moments in an argumentative way, as I believe that what we need is more argument and less denunciation, and especially more logic and less demagoguery on the other side of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Let us see what we have done for business. In the first place, we have taken off $450,000,000 in excess-profit tax. Oh, some gentlemen say, of course, you took off the tax, but there would have been no excess profits. I can only say that gentlemen forget that this excess-profit tax several years back amounted to $2,500,000,000, and when we say that we took off $450,000,000, we mean that the Treasury experts say that that amount is going to come off and will not be paid. I know this is said to be a tax that is paid by the profiteer. There never was a more unfounded statement. Excess-profit tax is not paid in that way except in name. It is based on the net income in proportion to the invested capital. One concern may be making 50 per cent profit on sales and not pay a cent of excess-profit tax, while another concern may make only 5 per cent to 8 per cent, or sometimes only 3 per cent, on sales of the same kind and in the same business and have to pay an excess-profit tax.

It is difficult to fix it so that it will work equitably. We originally levied it on corporations, persons, and partnerships. We took it off the persons and the partnerships because it worked inequitably, and then we found as a result of that that we had added probably a greater evil in a great many cases and that a greater injustice was done. So I say that we have taken off business $450,000,000 in the way of reducing the excess-profits tax. We have, of course, added in the place of that 23 per cent to the corporation income tax. I confess that I have never been very much in favor of this flat corporation tax, which has seemed to me to have as many bad features in it as the excess-profits tax, with no especial merit. It is a matter of theory whether this is a better tax than some other kind that might have been levied, as, for example, the tax on undistributed profits, which I favored. But it was in the bill as it passed the House, and we can not get anything else. This tax puts back $130,000,000, leaving the total gain to business as engaged in corporations $310,000,000. The gentleman from Texas says, "Ah, but you take it off the corporations." Of course. Who does the great business of this country? Corporations. We take it off business, and in taking it off corporations where or how is the benefit finally conferred? As every gentleman knows, it goes eventually to the stockholders in the corporations, the individuals. We take it off business, we take it off the corporations, we take it off the individuals who have the stock in the corporations, but it makes just that much more subject to surtaxes on their individual incomes. The final test becomes, as it should, the amount of the individual income.

We have also reduced the tax on income from capital sales made either by a corporation or individual to 12½ per cent. We permit net losses to be carried even to two years after the time they were sustained, and all through the bill we have lifted the restrictions on business, lightened its burdens, and made the return and settlement of taxes easier.

I wish we could go further in taking off taxes, and right there, and because this question was raised the other day with reference to the surtaxes on income tax, I want to say that there is no tax in this bill that I would not like to see lowered, if it could be done, and still have enough to carry on the Government.

Unfortunately, there has been a good deal of intemperate discussion on both sides of the House with reference to certain features of the bill. On the Democratic side they have been reckless to demagoguery in charging that the bill took the taxes off the rich and put them on the poor, when, as a matter of fact, as they know, the bill increased nobody's taxes but decreased the taxes of practically everyone who was a taxpayer. There was nothing in this statement, and those who made it knew it full well. On the Republican side some gentlemen who were not so familiar with the situation as they might be have asserted that the purpose of retaining the surtaxes at the figure fixed by the Senate was merely to tax the rich and that those who voted for the proposition knew it. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to stand under any such aspersion. I would be equally justified in saying that the gentlemen who made such statements were animated by desires to protect the multimillionaires from the payment of their just share of the taxes. Let us look for a moment into the situation and we shall see how utterly unfounded and baseless was the charge they were making.

The bill as it left the House did absolutely nothing for the man with an income of from $5,000 up to $68,000, but it did reduce the maximum of surtaxes from 65 per cent to 32 per cent. The Senate bill made very substantial reductions in the surtaxes on incomes of from $5,000 to $10,000, a 2 per cent reduction in surtaxes from $10,000 to $20,000, and a small reduction was made from there on. These reductions would cost the Government $70,000,000, but the parties that obtained the benefit of them would otherwise receive no reductions under the law. Nevertheless, the $70,000,000 had to be made up, in part at least, as the Government could not afford to lose that amount of revenue. The Senate therefore raised the limit on surtaxes to 50 per cent, which is 15 per cent less than the present law, and thereby will obtain $50,000,000. A compromise was proposed at 40 per cent, but this would have left the Government without sufficient revenue if we continued the reductions on the smaller incomes. Let me ask you whether the Republican Party could afford to go out and say we reduced the taxes on the multimillionaires 25 per cent but did not reduce the tax on incomes a nickle for those who had incomes of from $5,000 to $68,000. I say we could not afford to do this for the reason that the proposition was simply indefensible. If we retained the reductions on the smaller incomes, we could not put the surtaxes lower than 50 per cent. We had to have the money; there was no other place to get it; and this fact alone is sufficient to settle the point at issue.

Let us examine for a moment the arguments that were introduced in its support. It is said that if the high surtaxes are continued those with the great incomes will put their money into tax-exempt securities instead of into active business. The rate is 65 per cent now and we have only to examine the New York stock transactions to see that enormous sums are being put into taxable securities and that there is no lack whatever for funds of legitimate business, the reserve bank discount rate in New York having gone as low as 4½ per cent. Let me add a prediction that this discount rate will go to 4 per cent before very long.

Just the other day a $50,000,000 issue of telephone securities was oversubscribed on the market more than nine times. Enormous amounts of foreign securities, all of them taxable, are being marketed every day on the stock exchange. The margin between taxable securities and tax-exempt securities of the same nature and character has been small on the exchange. Railroad securities in the form of equipment trusts are so readily marketed that the talk is now that it is not necessary for the railroad funding bill to be put through at all, that the Government can dispose of the railroad securities without it. Some one asks, "How can the multimillionaire afford to hold these securities?" The answer is that when he buys them he does not buy them direct and holds through some corporation whose taxes are comparatively small. Doubtless some large estates which can not operate in this manner are buying tax-exempt securities, but the best information that I can get from dealers in stocks and bonds is that tax-exempt securities are largely sold to people of moderate incomes instead of the multimillionaires. There is not the slightest trouble about obtaining money for any business in the East that tends to show a profit, and so far as the men having these enormous incomes putting their money into farm loans this is all nonsense. They never did it. For years I was associated with a concern that did a large and active business in this line. The principal funds for farm loans, outside of what is now furnished by the Government, always came from the savings banks and the insurance companies, with a considerable proportion of local investors. The insurance companies are now finding other investments so much more profitable that they have greatly curtailed their loans. The local investor is for the time being nonexistent and the savings banks can not furnish the money that is required, consequently there has been a great shortage of funds that were loanable on farm securities, but the surtaxes have had nothing to do with it.

As I said before there are some large estates that are buying tax-exempt securities, but in order to stop them the surtaxes would have to be reduced to 20 per cent or lower. Indeed, I have heard no one claim that there would be any difference in investments whether the limit on surtaxes was 32 per cent, 40 per cent, or 50 per cent.

A year and a half ago when we prepared the bill giving the bonus to the soldiers we actually increased in that bill the surtaxes from 65 per cent to 68 per cent. An overwhelming majority of the House on both sides voted for it and not a word was said about any attempt to "soak" the rich. Those that voted against the bill voted against it because they did not believe in the bonus, and the Treasury experts told us that a considerable amount of money could be obtained by raising the surtaxes, but at that time the propaganda to the effect that lowering the surtaxes would increase the revenues had not yet been started.

The portion of the income tax in controversy applies only to about 1,100 people. It is a fundamental and almost universally accepted proposition that taxes should be assessed in accordance with the ability to pay, and that a graduated income tax is the fairest kind of a tax that can be levied. This does not mean, of course, that we should levy taxes at rates which we know will not be productive, but such is not the case here. The Treasury experts, who have never failed us yet, tell us how much these taxes will produce, and it is idle for gentlemen who never have investigated the matter to say that we will not get as much out of these taxes as if they were levied some other way. Let us have done with this kind of talk imputing unworthy motives. It has no place here. The tax bill should be presented on what it is, and its examination shows, notwithstanding certain defects in detail, it is a great measure, relieving the masses, relieving business, and reducing the amount of money drawn from the pockets of the people to the lowest possible amount at the present time.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question having been ordered, the question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the conference report on H. R. 8245 be, and the same is hereby, recommitment to the Committee on Conference, and that the managers on the part of the House be, and they are hereby, instructed in conference to agree to Senate amendment No. 582, without amendment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to recommit is not in order. There is no question about a general motion to recommit being in order, but a motion to recommit, coupled with instructions to the managers on the part of the House, constitutes two separate actions, and since the previous question had been ordered there is nothing left except the motion to recommit. It is not like a motion to recommit to a committee with instructions to that committee to do a certain thing, because it is obviously not proper for us to recommit to the conferees with directions to the committee on conference to do certain things. This constitutes two entirely separate and distinct matters. One is to recommit it to the committee on conference and the other, not instructions to the conference, because we have no such power, but to instruct the managers on the part of the House. After the previous question has been ordered I submit that such a motion does not lie.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding of the rules—I am not an expert parliamentarian in the sense that I studied the rules to the extent of knowing the application of the general rule to a particular matter—but it is my understanding of the rules as amended during the first session of the Democratic administration in the House, when the reform in the rules was adopted, that the House has the right to move to recommit any proposition it has before it with instructions to either the conferees or the committee or whatever body has the measure in charge. We went so far as to take away from the Committee on Rules the power to take that particular privilege away from the House. I know that the spirit of the rule of recommitment is embodied in the motion, and I think it is in order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, there is no question about a motion to recommit being in order. The point I make is that the motion to recommit, after the previous question, is the only thing that is in order, and that does not permit the tacking on to the motion to recommit of a separate and distinct proposition of instructions to the conferees on the part of the House. This constituting two separate matters, we would have the right to have them separated in voting upon them.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to me that there is any difference in principle between a motion to recommit a conference report and a motion to recommit a bill. A motion to recommit a bill always comes after the previous question has been ordered, and you can recommit with or without instructions. So long as the conference is in existence, you can recommit to that conference, as I understand the rules of the House, and if you can recommit simply, you can recommit with instructions. I do not see any possible difference between that and a motion to recommit a bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit the conference report to the committee on conference, with instructions to the managers on the part of the House to concur in a certain Senate amendment, viz, Senate amendment No. 582.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] makes the point of order that, the previous question having been ordered on the question of agreeing to the conference report, a motion to recommit with instructions is not in order. The Chair will state that under the rules of the House the adoption of the previous question or its being adopted by unanimous consent does not shut out one motion to recommit. The rules have been careful to preserve a motion to recommit, going to the extent of providing that the Committee on Rules may not report a rule which will shut out one motion to recommit. The question of recommitting a conference report to the committee on conference or to the managers on the part of the House is in some respects similar to recommitting a bill to one of the standing committees of the House, and while it is usual to recommit bills to the standing committees of the House with instructions, it is not always necessary that instructions be included in the motion to recommit.

In this instance the conference is, so to speak, still in existence; that is, at least until action has been had on the part of the House. The House being the body to which the conference report is first submitted by action in this particular case, the conferees are still subject to action by the House if the House under a proper motion sees fit to instruct them or takes such other action as may be proper for their guidance.

The motion to recommit a conference report with instructions has been of comparatively recent origin. It has been several times permitted, and on February 16, 1921, the previous question had been ordered on adopting a conference report on a bill to increase the salaries in the Patent Office. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] at that time offered a motion to recommit the report to the committee on conference, with instructions not to agree to section 9 of the Senate bill, which happened to be section 11 in the conference report. A point of order was made at that time by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and the Speaker overruled the point of order, saying:

The conferees still have control of the bill. They are not discharged until the conference report is agreed to or something else happens. They still have control of the measure.

In this instance the Chair thinks an analogous situation is presented, and he holds that the measure is still in a situation that if the House shall see fit to recommit it with instructions the conferees would be bound by such instructions.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] to recommit the conference report to the committee of conference with certain instructions.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 141, nays 202, answered "present" 1, not voting 89, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.
 On motion by Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its chief clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1039) for the public protection of maternity and infancy and providing a method of cooperation between the Government of the United States and the several States.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman give us any idea when we will have a chance to pass the bill that the House Banking and Currency Committee unanimously directed the chairman to ask a rule for some time ago, and which the chairman of the Committee on Rules the other day said he had never heard of?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know just what bill the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. WINGO. It is the bill which extends for 12 months the law which expired on October 31, covering loans of original subscribers to Liberty bonds. The Senate a long time ago passed a joint resolution extending the time for a year. That joint resolution was messaged over to the House and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and that committee reported it out in ample time and directed the chairman by a unanimous vote to ask the Committee on Rules for a rule providing for its consideration. The chairman of the Rules Committee the other day said that he had never heard of it. I know the gentleman from Wyoming has heard of it.

Mr. MONDELL. If it is a meritorious measure, as the gentleman from Arkansas seems to think it is, I hope we will have an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman says a rule was asked for. I will say that if a rule was asked for, it was asked from somebody not on the Rules Committee.

Mr. WINGO. I repeat my original statement that the House Committee on Banking and Currency unanimously directed the chairman of that committee to ask for a rule, and the presumption always is that the chairman of the committee does as he is directed by the committee to do.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That has never been done in this case.

Mr. WINGO. I am not to blame for that.
 Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Committee on Rules is not to blame for it either.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it is not fair to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency to make this statement in his absence. I notice that he is not present.

Mr. WINGO. There is no question about the matter, and the chairman of the committee was present the other day when I called attention to the matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, has that deficiency bill been filed?

Mr. MONDELL. It has.
 Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And points of order reserved?
 Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. If my friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will pursue the inquiry sufficiently to ascertain the facts about it, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] can satisfy his meticulous soul that there is such a bill, and that the action of the committee has been taken as I have stated, I shall not object, hoping that we can get an opportunity to consider the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question that there is such a bill, and there is also no question that the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency has done his full duty.

Mr. WINGO. The chairman of the Committee on Rules says that he has never been asked for the rule that the Committee on Banking and Currency directed the chairman to get. But the question of responsibility rests with the Republicans, who have a nearly three to one majority in this House. Just when is this great majority going to function and quit blaming the Democratic minority for the incompetency and indifference of the majority?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Banking and Currency Committee may have overlooked the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. HUTCHINSON] is detained at home by illness. He wishes me to state that if present he would have voted for the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2724. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the White River in Prairie County, Ark.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7394) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Tombigbee River at or near Ironwood Bluff, in the county of Itawamba, Miss.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, November 22, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

272. A letter from the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting statement of the additional compensation paid to the employees of the Federal Trade Commission for the first four months of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922; to the Committee on Appropriations.

273. A letter from the secretary and chief clerk of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, transmitting a statement showing in detail the travel from Washington to points outside of the District of Columbia performed by officers and employees (other than special agents, inspectors, and employees who in the discharge of their regular duties are required to constantly travel) of the Federal Board for Vocational Education during the fiscal year 1921; to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MADDEN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 487), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RAKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. ## SENATE.

TUESDAY, November 22, 1921.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, November 16, 1921.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Shortridge
Ball	Gerry	McKinley	Simmons
Borah	Glass	McLean	Smith
Brandeggee	Gooding	McNary	Smoot
Broussard	Hale	Myers	Spencer

Calder	Harrison	Nicholson	Sterling
Capper	Heflin	Norbeck	Swanson

Crow	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Trammell
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Page	Wadsworth
Cummins	Kendrick	Penrose	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Kenyon	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Dial	Keyes	Pittman	Watson, Ga.
du Pont	King	Poinexter	Watson, Ind.
Elkins	Ladd	Fomerene	Weller
Ernst	La Follette	Robinson	Williams
Fernald	Lenroot	Sheppard	Willis
France	McCumber	Shields

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-five Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. PENROSE obtained the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. PENROSE. I rose for the purpose of asking to have the conference report on the revenue measure submitted to the Senate, but I will yield for a moment to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the situation in the Ford-Newberry contest is such that it has seemed that we ought to arrive, if possible, at some general agreement in regard to it. Of course, the conference report on the revenue bill has the right of way and is now the unfinished business, but we know on both sides that there are a number of Senators who wish an adjournment this week if the revenue bill can be gotten out of the way. We also know that a number of Senators upon both sides have made all their arrangements to go to Haiti on Government business, leaving perhaps to-morrow, and they will not be back until about the 20th of December.

It seems to me most unfair that the Ford-Newberry matter should be taken up either to interfere with the adjournment that is so much desired or with the opportunity of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and others to be absent on the trip to Haiti. I have, after some consultation, drawn a unanimous-consent agreement which I submit to the Senate to see if it meets with the approval of the Senate. I ask that the Secretary may read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The reading clerk read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 1 o'clock p. m. on the second calendar day upon which the Senate is in session after December 25, 1921, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 172, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan, etc., and any amendment or substitute that may then be pending or that may be offered thereto, and will proceed with such consideration to the exclusion of other business until the question is disposed of. That on said second calendar day and thereafter until the final vote is taken no Senator shall speak more than once or for a longer period than 30 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. I object.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from North Carolina objects.

Mr. SPENCER. I wonder if there is any ground for the objection that could be accommodated. The Senator from North Carolina—

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated the other day when I objected, and I desire to repeat it—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina objects.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am replying to an inquiry made of me by the Senator from Missouri. I stated several days ago, when this question was up in executive session, that in a matter of this importance touching the dignity of the Senate, involving the right of a man to a seat in this body, involving the question whether that seat was purchased with money, a question which affects the fundamentals of our Government, I for one did not intend to consent that debate upon that vital question, upon that great issue, shall be limited to an hour.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator allow me to ask whether he considers that between the 5th of December and the date fixed in the unanimous-consent agreement there is not opportunity for unlimited discussion and unlimited debate. There is no limitation upon the debate that any Senator may wish to make upon this subject until after the second day which follows the 25th of December when the Senate shall be in session.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is proposed, as I understand it, that we shall adjourn to-morrow, or to-day, if possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not a part of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not speaking about the proposed agreement. I am speaking about the understanding among Senators. It is understood among Senators that we are going to adjourn if possible to-day or to-morrow until the 5th of December. What time is there for a discussion of this question between now and the 5th of December? It is proposed that two days after we take it up—

Mr. SPENCER. May I state to the Senator from North Carolina that from the 5th of December until the 25th of December there is opportunity for unlimited debate. The unanimous-consent agreement does not begin operating until after the 25th of December.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I have not understood it.

Mr. SPENCER. I thought the Senator from North Carolina did not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina withdraw his objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair addressed an inquiry to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not at this time object.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I simply wish to make one suggestion. I do not propose to interfere with the address of the Senator from Alabama but I wanted to offer this suggestion first. The unanimous-consent agreement refers to the second day after we reconvene after December 25, as I recall it. I suggest changing that to the fourth day. I do that simply for this reason: Some of us will perhaps be away attending to the business of the Senate. I am entirely content with the other provisions. I simply offer that as a suggestion, and, perhaps, at a later hour we can harmonize our differences.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator desires it might be changed to read the second day after the 1st day of January, because I am assuming that there will be some Christmas holidays, and the effect, in my judgment, will be precisely the same. If we do not arrive—

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

Mr. SPENCER. May I say to the Senator, if we do not arrive at some unanimous-consent agreement, of course, the question would naturally come up on the 5th day of December for such discussion and action, and that is what I want to prevent if possible.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that very fully, but I simply want—

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield, and if so, to whom? There are several Senators claiming attention.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know to whom to yield in view of there being so many Senators on their feet.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thought the Chair recognized me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognized the Senator from Alabama only under the yielding of the Senator from Pennsylvania for the purpose of adjusting the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, as I understand I had the floor and merely yielded to the Senator from Missouri to make a request for unanimous consent. Has that request been submitted to the Senate?

Mr. HEFLIN. For the present, I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me to make a statement? I think I can help facilitate the agreement.

Mr. PENROSE. If the statement will not lead to prolonged debate, I will yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. It will not lead to any debate, so far as I am concerned, but if the Senator from Pennsylvania is disposed to proceed with his remarks at this time, I shall refrain from making any suggestion. I was moving at the request of the Senator from Missouri—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. HEFLIN. I object at this time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. PENROSE. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. PENROSE. I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama will state his point of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. On yesterday afternoon before the conference report on the tax revision bill was submitted, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] asked me to yield, which I did, and I asked him how long he thought it would take to dispose of the proposition. He said not more than a few minutes.

Mr. PENROSE. That is not a point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then I said:

Very well; or if Senators on the other side desire to take a recess after the report is received, I can conclude in the morning.

Mr. PENROSE. I make the point of order that that is not a point of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President—

Mr. PENROSE. I have the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. The colloquy continues:

Mr. PENROSE. I think we are working toward that end, if the Senator will permit me. I do not intend to push the report now. I simply want to have it before the body.

Then, Mr. President, on page 8062 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I can go on in the morning and finish then?

Mr. SPENCER. Surely.

I would not have yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania except under the understanding that I was to have the floor and conclude my speech, and I do not suppose that the Senator from Pennsylvania will now undertake to violate that agreement.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I had no agreement. The Senator from Alabama will get the floor in due time and in his own right. Meanwhile I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands from the colloquy which has been read by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] that he claims that there was an agreement that he should be permitted to resume his discussion this morning. The Chair does not feel that he is bound or that the Senate is bound by a colloquy of that sort. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order, and the Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. PENROSE. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. One more word. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] who had charge of this matter in debate—

Mr. PENROSE. I have the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. I had the floor and yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania, and the Senator from Missouri assured me that I could go on in the morning and conclude.

Mr. PENROSE. I have the floor, have I not, Mr. President? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has ruled two or three times that the Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask for order.

Mr. HEFLIN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. ASHURST. A point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona. Mr. ASHURST. It is not appealable. That is one of the unappealable questions unfortunately; but the Senator from Alabama is right—

Mr. PENROSE. The Chair has ruled.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Alabama was assured by the Senate that he would have a right to resume his speech this morning.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senate gave no such assurance.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Missouri did give the assurance, because I heard him.

Mr. PENROSE. I disagree with the Senator that any assurance was given by the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Record shows that assurance was given.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Missouri will bear me out in the statement that he guaranteed that the Senator from Alabama should have the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. I shall have to ask that the Sergeant at Arms restore order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the pending question, which is the appeal of the Senator from Alabama from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. PENROSE. There can not be an appeal.

Mr. ASHURST. The question is not appealable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that there can be an appeal.

Mr. PENROSE. I differ from the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Chair kindly state what the question is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama makes the point of order that under the colloquy or discussion which occurred last night he is entitled to resume the speech this morning that he was then making. The Chair has overruled the point of order, having recognized the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Senator from Alabama appeals from the ruling of the Chair. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] and vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANDELL] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] and vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I inquire if the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that Senator has not voted.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with that Senator, and inasmuch as he is absent, I will be compelled to withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). In the absence of my general pair, the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I withdraw my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] upon official business. He is paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL].

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In the absence of that Senator, being unable to secure a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I inquire if the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that Senator has not voted.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCKINLEY. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 25, as follows:

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. PENROSE. Now, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the measure known as the conference report on the revenue bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEFLIN resumed the speech begun by him on yesterday. In the course of his remarks a colloquy took place between Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. PENROSE and words were spoken by both Senators which the President pro tempore declared to be a violation of the rule. On motion of Mr. LENROOT, the objectionable words were expunged from the RECORD, and, on motion of Mr. HARRISON, Mr. HEFLIN was permitted to proceed in order. His speech is as follows:

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senate is called upon to perform a very important and solemn duty. The case awaiting its decision can not be laughed out of this tribunal; it involves the good name, the honor, and integrity of the Senate itself; it concerns and affects the welfare of the whole American people; it is the most important question now pending before this historic body.

My good friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] has suggested that he thought it unwise for southern Senators to speak upon this occasion. I can not understand that philosophy; I do not know by what rule a southern Senator would be excused from taking part in this debate, from denouncing wrong when he thought there was wrong, and for standing for the best interests of his country and for the honor of the body of which he is a Member. When did it become an offense or even an inappropriate thing for a southern Senator to take part in defending the good name of this body and in demanding clean and honest government at the Capital of the Nation?

It is the duty of Senators from Alabama, just as it is the duty of Senators from Maine, Kansas, Ohio, California, and all the other States, to guard with diligence the honor and integrity of the Senate of the United States. This is not a sectional question, nor is it a party question; it is a question of the highest national importance; it concerns the whole American people. Opposition to Mr. Newberry is not confined to the Democratic side. Some of the ablest and best Republicans in this Chamber are outspoken in their opposition to him. So there must be something radically wrong about the means that he employed to secure a seat in the Senate of the United States. It does appear, I am sorry to say, that certain partisan Republicans seem determined to do everything in their power to see that he is seated here regardless of all the ugly and odious charges that stand against him. Let us go back to the early part of the year 1918 when Truman H. Newberry was making his plans to run for the Senate in Michigan.

Mr. Newberry is in New York.

He sends for Paul King, a prominent politician in Michigan. King goes to New York and has a conference with Truman Newberry, the prospective candidate. He wants King to manage his campaign in the Republican primary, and the first thing he asked King was, how much it would cost him, Newberry, to make the race.

King told him that it would cost him $50,000, or rather as Paul King puts it, "It will cost your friends more than it did Mr. TOWNSEND's friends; it will be at least $50,000."

The suggestion that it would cost the friends of Mr. Newberry so much was, of course, an afterthought. It was never thought of until after an investigation was commenced by a Federal court grand jury in Michigan. Then it was decided that they would all say that it was Newberry's friends and not Newberry that did this thing or that thing in the primary for the Senate.

He made Paul King his campaign manager with the distinct understanding that the primary race in Michigan was going to cost him at least $50,000. So it is clear and plain that Mr. Newberry entered the Republican primary in Michigan as a candidate for the Senate knowing that $50,000, at least, was going to be expended in his behalf, in open violation of the law of Michigan and of the Federal law governing expenditures in a race for the Senate. When he consented at the outset to the expenditure of at least $50,000 in his behalf in the primary in Michigan, he committed himself to a money or boodle campaign and showed very clearly his intention to use whatever amount of money was deemed necessary to secure the nomination to the Senate.

What does the law of Michigan say upon the subject? It says that a candidate for the Senate in a primary in either party shall not expend for all purposes more than $3,750. What did the law of Congress say upon that subject—and that law was in full force and effect at that time? It said that no candidate nor his friends should expend for all purposes more than $10,000.

What do we find Mr. Newberry doing? Agreeing at the beginning to violate both the State and the Federal statute. He spent, according to the testimony, more than fifty-two times as much as the State of Michigan said should or could be spent legally in a primary. He spent, that we know about, nineteen times as much as the House and the United States Senate said should or could be spent in a senatorial primary. Mr. President, I have practiced law in my time. It has been a good, long time since I tried a law case. I have heard some very ridiculous propositions made in the courthouse in the trial of cases, but the most ridiculous and the flimsiest contention that I have ever known intelligent men to indulge in is that Truman Newberry knew nothing of what was going on in the primary in Michigan; that he had nothing to do with the primary when he selected his own campaign manager after being informed by him that it would cost him, Newberry, $50,000; that he had nothing to do with it when his brother, John S. Newberry, a partner with him in business, aided him financially, their funds one and the same, kept in the same strong box, both of them having the same confidential agent, with power of attorney to give checks upon both, as he did—that he knew nothing about what was going on in his behalf in a race for the Senate up in Michigan. I repeat is preposterous and ridiculous.

Why, Mr. President, as the able Republican Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said this morning, a man could be convicted of murder upon the character of testimony that has been adduced in this case against Truman Newberry if he were being tried upon the charge of murder.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I yield to my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wanted to call the Senator's attention to the fact, which he may discuss later, that immediately after this campaign manager was selected he not only had a conference with Truman Newberry but thereafter, until the primary was over, he wrote him or telegraphed him or telephoned him nearly every day, making reports to him, and Newberry wrote to this campaign manager almost every day during the entire time.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my friend from Tennessee for that suggestion. I will discuss that a little later.

Mr. President, how grimly amazing are some of the features of this Newberry case. This man who seeks admission to this body was indicted in his own State for corrupting the voters of Michigan, for unlawfully obtaining the nomination in the primary. He was indicted, and a petit jury was impaneled to try him; it did try him, and convicted him, and with all this testimony raging around him, accused of the high crime of corrupting the voters and through scandalous means obtaining the nomination for the Senate, he sat as silent as the tomb. He never took the witness stand to explain to the jury just why he expended or permitted to be expended thousands and tens of thousands of dollars in the effort to secure for him the Republican nomination for the Senate. And yet some Senators on the other side have the audacity to say that we who deny that Truman Newberry, under the circumstances, is entitled to a seat here are persecuting him.

Far from it, Mr. President. When we condemn the Newberry campaign in Michigan we are doing our duty and serving the people of the whole country.

John S. Newberry, brother to Truman Newberry, testified that he contributed, in round numbers, about $100,000 to his brother's campaign, when the law of the State of Michigan said that only $3,750 should or could legally be expended.

Does that look like persecution upon our part? But let us continue to follow the trail of this brazen attempt to buy a seat in the United States Senate.

The Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections is called to consider this case. Its members sit for days and weeks taking testimony. But those who oppose Mr. Newberry are denied the most important testimony in the case. Old checks and check stubs and the books of the bank, which would show what the checks were for, were denied, and this after the Newberry checks had been destroyed, and destroyed, I think, by the friends of Mr. Newberry. An effort was made to get the old checks, stubs, and bank books used in the primary in Michigan, but Mr. Newberry's friends said that they had all been misplaced or destroyed and could not be found. And yet they accuse us of persecuting a man the title to whose seat in this body is covered and clouded with the slime and scandal of such crooked and corrupt conduct. If the primary campaign in Michigan had been free from wrongdoing and corrupt practice, all of the checks and books and documents used would have been laid by Mr. Newberry before the Senate committee.

Senators, are you ready to say in the face of this testimony that you approve the means employed by Mr. Newberry in securing the Michigan primary nomination for the Senate? Are you ready to vote for campaign methods in a senatorial race that will make of this body a millionaire's club?

I have shown, Mr. President, that minority members on the committee investigating the Newberry case tried to secure the checks, check stubs, and bank books used in financing the Newberry campaign. Now I wish to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that Senators POMERENE, WALSH of Montana, KING, and ASHBURST, members of the committee, requested the majority of the committee to invite Mr. Newberry to come before the committee and testify. But, strange to say, Mr. Newberry did not come of his own accord, and the majority members of the committee declined to even request him to come. I wonder why?

Senators, are you going to vote to seat a man in this body who fails and refuses to explain to you the campaign methods employed by him to secure a seat in the Senate? He remained silent when tried by a Federal court jury in Michigan, and after giving him the benefit of every doubt that jury, composed of 11 Republicans and 1 Democrat, found him guilty as charged. The same Michigan primary is under consideration here. The same Truman H. Newberry is on trial, and he is doing the same thing here that he did up there. He is refusing to testify. He is silent here as he was silent there. Does not this show that he is afraid to permit himself to be questioned? Senators, are you going to reject the testimony, permit this man to remain silent, and vote to seat him anyhow just because he is a man of tremendous wealth?

I can not believe that you will do it. But we are reminded that he was required by law to make a statement regarding campaign expenses and that he did so just after the primary in Michigan. In that statement he said that the money contributed and expended was done without his knowledge or consent, and that he had nothing whatever to do with the senatorial primary. That statement was there when the Michigan jury convicted him of the extravagant and unlawful use of money in the senatorial primary. It is evident that the jury did not, could not, believe that statement. How could the jury believe that statement when the testimony showed that his brother, John S. Newberry, his partner in business, had contributed to his campaign about $100,000, and that he, Truman Newberry, had been writing and wiring his campaign manager, Paul King, all during the campaign? Of course, he knew that money was being expended in his behalf. Does any Senator here believe that he did not know all that was going on in his campaign?

Mr. President, if thousands and tens of thousands of dollars could be spent as was spent by his brother and other members of the family without him knowing what was going on, and if he was conferring with Paul King frequently, as was the case, and writing and wiring him about the campaign, as he did do, and still knew nothing about what was going on, I submit that he is incompetent to sit as a Member of this body. You could not conduct a campaign like that around a 5-year-old boy without him knowing something about it.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] told us that Mr. Ford contracted to build certain ships for the Government. I want to read what Mr. Templeton, the chairman of Mr. Newberry's campaign committee, said in his testimony before the Senate committee investigating the Newberry case. He said:

If I might explain, I will try to do so briefly. I had been going to New York every few weeks to see Mr. Newberry in connection with our business. We were the two largest stockholders, and we were doing a great deal of Government work at that time, and it was customary for me to go at least once a week to New York.

Mr. Templeton was in charge of the Newberry headquarters at Detroit, Mich., while Paul King was general manager. So it seems that Mr. Newberry was not entirely a disinterested patriot. He and his partner were selling the Government vast quantities of war material and making, no doubt, a tremendous profit.

Mr. President, while Henry Ford is not at all involved in this contest, I want to say just here that during the war he devoted the vast machinery of his great American workshop to the needs of the Government and furnished war supplies at a price that barely covered the cost of production.

Does anybody believe that Mr. Templeton, Mr. Newberry's partner and actively aiding in the conduct of the Newberry campaign in Michigan, went to see Mr. Newberry, had talks with Mr. Newberry, and did not even mention the senatorial campaign to Mr. Newberry?

Of course Mr. Templeton discussed with candidate Newberry the senatorial race in Michigan and of course they discussed what Mr. Templeton and Paul King regarded as the financial needs of the campaign, and of course Mr. Newberry knew what was going on in his own senatorial campaign.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Alabama has called attention to the fact that Mr. King had given Mr. Newberry the information that it would cost him and his friends at least $50,000. Mr. Newberry did not hold up his hands in horror at that statement, but a short time before that, when he was seeking to get Mr. Hayden to manage his campaign, and Mr. Hayden told him that he—Newberry—would have to conduct a barrel campaign in order to win out, then he said that of course he did not want any barrel campaign.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I thank the able Senator from Ohio for that suggestion, and in that connection I want to show how money was to figure in this campaign.

Prior to the engaging of Paul King as manager Mr. Newberry sent Mr. Cody down to Washington to see a brilliant newspaper man of this city, Mr. Hayden, and Cody said, "Hayden, Mr. Newberry wants you to take charge of the campaign. You are representing a big daily paper up in Michigan," and Mr. Cody told Mr. Hayden that Mr. Truman H. Newberry would make it very interesting for him financially. Hayden said, "I do not think I could undertake the work," and he intimated very strongly that it was to be a money campaign, and that he did not want to have anything to do with it.

Then what did Cody, Mr. Newberry's special agent, say to him? He said, "Mr. Newberry will make you such a flattering financial offer that you can not afford to refuse it." Mr. President, Mr. Newberry had changed his mind about the barrel campaign, and he had, according to Cody's statement to Hayden, determined to get the primary nomination in Michigan by the unlawful use of vast sums of money. But Hayden refused to prostitute his talents and sell his soul even for a fabulous sum of Newberry money. May his tribe increase. Then Paul King was employed by Mr. Newberry, and the first thing the candidate discussed with his manager was the probable cost of the campaign. He was told, as I have said, at the outset that it would cost him half a hundred thousand dollars. Through the extravagant and unlawful use of money he procured the nomination, and now in order to have him seated here they would have us believe that he had nothing to do with providing money and nothing whatever to do with the campaign. How absurd and ridiculous! Suppose there was a man who, with certain other persons, was an heir to a large estate, and suppose that man should express the desire to have the other heirs put out of the way so that he could inherit all of the estate; and suppose he should ask a man what it would cost him to have the other heirs removed or put out of the way; and after being told that it would cost him $50,000 he should agree to pay the man that amount to do that dastardly thing; and suppose it is done as he suggested, and upon investigation it is shown that the heirs were murdered according to his expressed desire and plan, and that the $50,000 was paid to the murderer by the brother of the man who first suggested the putting of the heirs out of the way. Is there a jury in the world that would say that that man was not responsible for the death of the other heirs?

Is there a jury in the world that would acquit him of being a party—and the principal party—to the crime of murder? Is there a just judge in the world who would permit that man to inherit that estate under those circumstances?

In this illustration we have the Newberry case stated in another form. Mr. Truman Newberry wanted the Republican nomination for the Senate in Michigan, and others were also desiring it. Mr. Newberry asked how much it would cost him to obtain the coveted prize, and upon being told that it would cost him $50,000, he employed a man by the name of Paul King to represent him in securing it. Under Paul King's generalship the other candidates were all swamped with money and put out of the way, and the nomination was thus procured for Truman H. Newberry.

Now comes Mr. Newberry and tries to escape all responsibility for his own acts and doings, and his hard-pressed advocates here say that he did not contribute or spend any money in securing the nomination.

Upon investigation the testimony showed that the $50,000 that Paul King told Mr. Truman Newberry that it would cost to secure the nomination was paid by John S. Newberry, a brother and partner in business of Truman Newberry. The testimony showed that John S. Newberry paid twice $50,000 toward securing that nomination for his brother, and the testimony also showed that the agent of Truman Newberry and John S. Newberry, Fred Smith, who had authority to give checks on the joint bank account of both of them, did give checks for money used in the primary campaign upon the bank account belonging to both Truman H. Newberry and John S. Newberry. Is there any escape from the conclusion that Truman H. Newberry is responsible for and should be held accountable for the conduct of his senatorial campaign in Michigan?

Every one of the 12 jurors in Michigan, acting under their oaths, held that he was responsible and should be made to suffer the consequences of his own deliberate acts. Are Senators, acting under their oaths, now going to say by their votes that this man should be permitted to occupy a seat in the United States Senate?

Mr. President, I do not believe that there is an intelligent, unbiased man or woman in the country who could sit and listen to the great speech made by the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and then vote to give Mr. Newberry a seat in the Senate.

Following him came a brief but able and convincing speech by the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Then the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], a great lawyer, took up the testimony in the Newberry case and in a speech four hours long made a powerful and unanswerable argument in favor of unseating Mr. Newberry. He pleaded for the protection and preservation of the honor and integrity of the Senate.

Senators, the founders of the Republic never intended that seats in this body should become a matter of barter, to be bought and sold as a commodity in the market place.

The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] in his speech here very appropriately asked why it was that Mr. Newberry did not of his own accord go before the Senate committee and tell the committee just what he did and did not do in connection with his race for the Senate.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has the right view of this thing. He said that if his right to a seat in this body was questioned and a charge made that there was a cloud of scandal hanging over his title that he would not wait to be invited but would go to the committee having the case in hand and demand the right to be heard. That is the proper view to take of a case of this kind.

Senators, Mr. Newberry is accused of having wrongfully and unlawfully obtained the primary nomination for the Senate from the State of Michigan, and it is claimed that there is a black cloud of scandal hanging over his title to a seat in this Chamber, but he has never been before the Senate committee to explain the matter and he has never said one word in defense of his title. Mr. President, I submit that no man should be permitted to occupy a seat in this body who is not willing to explain and who can not fully explain to the satisfaction of the Senate matters involving his right to membership in this the greatest law-making body in the world.

The effort is being made here by some on the majority side to seat this man because he is a Republican. To appeal to party spirit in a case like this is to place blind partisan zeal above our oath of office, above duty to country, and above the best interest of the American people. I thank God that there are some on the other side who will not respond to the party call to cloak and cover up conduct that strikes at the very heart of the honor and integrity of the United States Senate.

No man, be he Democrat or Republican, situated as Mr. Newberry is in the case pending here, should be permitted to have membership in this body. There are Senators on the Republican side who feel just as I do about this matter, and they are not going to sanction the sale of seats in the Senate. Let me mention two of them—Senators BORAH and KENYON, both Republicans and two of the best lawyers in the Senate. They are reputed to be very just and fair men, and yet they do not feel that Mr. Newberry is entitled to a seat in this body. They would not deny him a seat here unless the charges were very serious and the proof very strong.

Why, Mr. President, the amount of money spent in the Newberry campaign was so large that the majority members of the committee, who now seek to give him a seat in this body, condemned in their report the expenditure of that enormous amount. The condemnation expressed by the majority members of the committee supports our contention and justifies our position. We do not stop with condemning it; we say that a seat obtained in that manner will never be occupied by him who is guilty of such a thing.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Some time ago—two hours ago—I interrupted the able speech of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to quote from the majority report, wherein they say, "We condemn the use of such a large sum of money," and asked my learned friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr.

SPENCER] to say whom they condemned. Now, just the abstract condemnation means nothing. I would like, in the Senator's time, to have the Senator from Missouri tell us whom they condemn. To condemn expenditure means nothing. You can not condemn the money, the bills, the bank notes; you condemn, of course, the person who spends the money.

I have waited a good while and I want an answer as to whom they condemn. Whom do they mean when they say, "We condemn the use of such a large sum of money." Do they mean Paul King? Do they mean Newberry? Whom do they mean, if anyone? I will ask my friend to answer that in the time of the Senator from Alabama. Whom do they mean when they say we condemn this expenditure?

Mr. SPENCER. Is the Senator from Arizona asking me a question?

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator from Missouri will not consider me impertinent or improper, I am asking him that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield for a very brief statement, but not for a speech.

Mr. ASHURST. Let us have an answer.

Mr. SPENCER. Such an answer as is satisfactory or such an answer as states the facts?

Mr. ASHURST. No; I want an answer as to the names of the men whom the Senator condemned, if any.

Mr. SPENCER. In the first place, there is nothing in the statement that condemns any man.

Mr. ASHURST. Whom does the Senator condemn, or what?

Mr. SPENCER. The statement says that that expenditure of money was too large.

Mr. ASHURST. Whose expenditure of money? The expenditure did not make itself.

Mr. SPENCER. We condemned the expenditure. Here is what we condemned, and I think I can say it without trespassing upon the time of the Senator from Alabama, for I would not take a word out of his mouth or trespass for a moment upon his time.

In the first place, we condemned the circumstances which required the use of so large an amount of money, namely, the running by Henry Ford upon the Democratic ticket and upon the Republican ticket at precisely the same time, with the backing of the then President of the United States.

Secondly, we condemned what we considered was the absolute anarchy and treachery of Henry Ford being injected into that campaign.

Notwithstanding those two facts, we condemned the use of so much money as was spent in that campaign in spite of those facts. Those who spent that money, namely, the independent committee that was running the Newberry campaign, were the men who collected the money and who spent it, and who, if there was any individual condemnation, would of course, as the Senator knows, have to bear it. There was not and there can not be the slightest connection between Truman H. Newberry and the expenditure of the money or the committee under which the expenditure was made.

Mr. ASHURST. With the permission of the Senator from Alabama may I make this further statement? My learned friend from Missouri condemns in the last analysis Wilson and Ford for the Newberry expenditures.

Mr. SPENCER. Partly; and in the last analysis, if I had time to go into it more than I have stated—

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator then in his report, and an able report from his viewpoint, condemns Wilson and Ford for the expenditure of the Newberry money.

Mr. SPENCER. Not at all.

Mr. ASHURST. Partially, then, for the Senator has named Wilson and Ford. I know the Senator has courage. He is a man who answers questions directly. Will the Senator, now having named Ford and Wilson, name somebody on the Newberry side whom he had in mind when he said, "We condemn these expenditures?"

Mr. SPENCER. I did not have in mind the—

Mr. ASHURST. Did the Senator have anybody in mind other than Wilson and Ford? Did he have Paul King in mind?

Mr. SPENCER. Partly.

Mr. ASHURST. Surely.

Mr. SPENCER. Partly.

Mr. ASHURST. And who was he?

Mr. SPENCER. He was the manager of the campaign.

Mr. ASHURST. For whom?

Mr. SPENCER. For himself.

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not yield further. That is sufficient.

Mr. ASHURST. Paul King was running, was he?

Mr. SPENCER. Oh, no.

Mr. ASHURST. I insist upon an answer. That is not sufficient.

Mr. SPENCER. That is sufficient. The Senator from Arizona is camouflaging. The Senator is quibbling. The Senator knows that Paul King was not running, and the Senator, away down in the bottom of his heart, knows that Paul King was not selected by Truman H. Newberry. The Senator knows that Paul King was selected by the independent committee that was voluntarily conducting that campaign—

Mr. ASHURST. For whom?

Mr. SPENCER. May I finish?

Mr. ASHURST. For whom?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I decline to yield further on this matter.

Mr. SPENCER. I thought it was coming to the time when the Senator would decline to yield further.

Mr. HEFLIN. I certainly do, when the Senator from Missouri states that Truman H. Newberry did not select Paul King.

Mr. SPENCER. There is no doubt about that statement, and if the Senator from Alabama will read the testimony he will come to the same conclusion.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have read the testimony. Paul King went to New York, and Mr. Newberry, the commander of the wooden ship out in the grove on dry land, asked how much it would cost him—not John Newberry—and Paul King told him, and later he made Paul King his manager, and Paul reported to him, according to his own testimony before this committee. He said, "I reported to him nearly every day."

I have here a letter that Truman H. Newberry wrote to his manager, Paul King, the day before the primary, thanking him and telling him how deeply he felt under obligation to him for what he had done. What he had done as John Newberry's manager? Oh, no; but for what he had done as Truman Newberry's manager.

Right in line with the suggestion that the majority members of the committee condemned the large amount of money expended, let me read what the attorneys for Mr. Newberry, those in charge of his case before the Senate committee, had to say about the Newberry campaign:

No man connected with the Newberry senatorial organization in a managerial or executive capacity has had the slightest occasion to apologize or be ashamed of anything he did in that connection.

They admit that they spent $200,000 in the Newberry campaign in Michigan. The conduct of that campaign was condemned by leading Republicans and leading newspapers in the State of Michigan. Even the majority of the Senate committee condemn it, but Mr. Newberry's attorneys boast that they do not apologize for anything, that they regret nothing that was done.

Mr. Attorney for Newberry, did you know what the statute of Michigan said about this thing? If you did not, I will read it to you:

No sums of money shall be paid and no expenses authorized or incurred by or on behalf of any candidate to be paid for him in order to secure or aid in securing his nomination to any public office or position in this State in excess of 25 per cent of one year's compensation or salary of the office for which he is a candidate.

That is the law, and it was openly and brazenly violated. Did any of the money spent in the Newberry campaign belong to Truman H. Newberry? Let us hear what his confidential agent, Fred Smith, has to say. I read from the testimony:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You had been talking to him—

Referring to Truman H. Newberry—

He wanted to know when these expenses were going to stop, did he not?

Mr. SMITH. I do not believe so. I think his conversation was about the drain on the balances in the office, and he was complaining about the money that was being spent.

Whose money is he talking about, Senators?

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Complaining about the large amount of expenses being drawn?

Mr. SMITH. Or the money that was being spent and drawn from the account all the time and put into his brother's account to keep from being overdrawn.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. And his funds as well as his brother's were used?

Mr. SMITH. And everybody else's.

So Fred Smith says that they used the money of Truman H. Newberry, of John S. Newberry, and the money of other members of the Newberry family. This is the trusted, confidential agent, the man who had the power of attorney to draw checks on Truman H. Newberry's money, testifying before the Senate committee that Truman H. Newberry's money was in that joint fund, his sister's money, his brother's money, his wife's money was there. So it is clear that they were drawing out of that fund and dishing money out in the State of Michigan to defray the expenses of the campaign of Mr. Truman H. Newberry.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that if he had not been agreeing to it, he could have canceled the power of attorney and stopped it that night?

Mr. HEFLIN. Absolutely. I thank my good friend from Arkansas for that very pertinent suggestion. Yes, Mr. President, if Truman H. Newberry had wanted to stop it, he could have said to Fred Smith, "I hereby revoke the power of attorney that you hold for me. Do not give another check on a dollar of my money." The thing would have stopped. But there is not a scintilla of testimony to that effect. What else do we see? We find Mr. Blair made treasurer of the Newberry campaign committee. He was president or vice president of the Union Trust Co. of Michigan, and Mr. Truman H. Newberry is a large stockholder in that company. We behold the trail of the serpent over it all. He is made treasurer, and what does he do? He gives out checks for money. To whom did he give them? To various people. He admits that he gave some checks to Templeton and Emery and Paul King, the general manager. Remember, Fred Smith was giving checks on the strong box of the Newberrys. Mr. Blair was asked why he was giving checks to certain people. He said: "Sometimes they needed cash and they wanted it quickly, and I gave them checks"—King, Templeton, and Emery.

Who is Blair? Why, he is Truman H. Newberry's partner in business. And what is he? He is treasurer of the Newberry campaign committee. What do we find him doing? We find him, just before the primary, calling upon a Mr. Dennis. Mr. Dennis is the secretary to Mr. Joy, and Mr. Joy is the brother-in-law of Truman H. Newberry; he married Mr. Newberry's sister. What does Mr. Blair say to Mr. Dennis? He says, "I want to call on you for $25,000 for the Newberry campaign fund. Mr. Joy told me that I could draw on him for that amount." And Mr. Blair got the $25,000 for use in the Newberry campaign. O Senators, how I would like to try this case before a precinct jury and a justice of the peace. There would not be any question about their verdict. They may be able to fool some United States Senators with this feeble, flimsy stuff, but it would not pass muster before a precinct jury and justice of the peace.

Talk about him not having anything to do with it! Again, I repeat, the suggestion is ridiculous.

"Mr. Blair, you gave checks to various people?" "Yes, sir." "Some of the checks were used for corrupt purposes, were they not?" "No, sir; none that I gave." Listen, Senators! Mr. Lucking asked: "Do you know what that money was used for?" "Well," he says, "I do not, except by what the vouchers showed." Mr. Lucking asked: "Then, you do not know, except by what the vouchers showed?" He said, "That is all."

Now, Senators, what are you going to do with a witness like that? He first testified that the money was not used for corrupt purposes, and then, on the next page of the testimony, he said, "I do not know for what purpose it was used, except what the vouchers showed."

Who fixed the vouchers? Why, the witnesses, who are trying to keep Truman H. Newberry in the background, fixed them. They wrote upon the vouchers whatever they were pleased to write.

Mr. President, what else do we find? The testimony shows that a check went in from Mrs. Truman H. Newberry, the wife of the candidate, for $15,000. "How much was it, Mr. Blair?" He said, "I do not remember, but I think it was for $15,000." "Did you cash the check?" Mr. Blair: "No, sir." "Why not, Mr. Blair?" Mr. Blair: "Because of the close relationship between Truman H. Newberry and his wife." "How about his brother John? He admits that he gave money freely." "Oh," says Mr. Blair, "that is all right." Again, "Why did you not cash Mrs. Newberry's check, Mr. Blair?" Here is what he said, "Because the lieutenant governor and the newspapers of Michigan were complaining about the expenditure of money in Truman H. Newberry's campaign, and the reason I did not cash the check was because I thought it would give them an opportunity to be more nasty than they had been before."

Mr. President, here is a confession on the part of Mr. Truman Newberry's business partner and campaign treasurer that the lieutenant governor of Michigan, a Republican, was complaining against and denouncing the scandalous conduct of the Newberry campaign, and here is an admission on the part of Mr. Blair that the campaign methods employed to secure the nomination to the Senate were of such a nature as to call down upon them the condemnation of newspapers in that State.

Paul King, Mr. Newberry's campaign manager, said that he kept Candidate Newberry informed about what was going on in the primary in Michigan, and the testimony shows that Mr.

Newberry wrote to him about the campaign constantly. And yet some Senators would have us believe that Mr. Newberry had nothing to do with his campaign, knew nothing about it, contributed no money to it, and did not consent for anybody else to contribute anything.

The jury in Michigan would not accept that theory. I wonder if they think United States Senators will accept it.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] does not seem to understand that the resolution passed by the Senate directed the Senate committee to inquire into the senatorial primary in Michigan. I submit to the Senator from Ohio that if Mr. Newberry obtained the primary nomination for the Senate through unfair methods and foul means, as the testimony shows he did, he was not properly before the people of the State as the Republican candidate for the Senate.

The petition against Mr. Newberry states, among other things—

That the large sums of money expended by and in behalf of the nomination of Truman H. Newberry, as hereinbefore stated, unlawfully enlisted the aid and support of large numbers of persons, papers, and periodicals throughout the State, and the results and influence of which extended down to and affected the election materially in favor of said Truman H. Newberry.

There is no denying the fact that if Mr. Newberry had not expended vast sums of money in the primary in Michigan he would never have defeated ex-Gov. Osborn for the primary nomination.

Where is Gov. Osborn, an able Republican and ex-governor of Michigan? Where is ex-Gov. Warner, a distinguished and popular Republican who was three times elected governor of the State of Michigan?

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will yield for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Alabama asks, Where is Gov. Osborn? After the nomination of Mr. Newberry, Gov. Osborn wrote a very strong rebuke to him on account of the expenditure of money. He said, "You spent all the money before Mr. Ford got into the race." Hence when my learned friend from Missouri says that President Wilson and Ford are to blame, he has forgotten that most of the money was spent before Ford ever got into the race.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Ohio is correct about that. Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Missouri has not forgotten, for the knowledge that Ford was going to enter the race was common knowledge all over the State of Michigan long before he actually entered it.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is disputed by the witnesses.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Missouri heretofore made that statement, and I disputed it and referred to exactly what the record shows. The record does not show that it was generally understood throughout the State of Michigan that Mr. Ford was to be a candidate. Such a statement is made in the brief filed by the attorney for Mr. Newberry before the committee, but it is wholly unsupported by the evidence. There is not anything of the kind in the record. I stated what the record shows. The record shows that Paul King said that he, Paul King, had always counted that Mr. Ford would be a candidate.

Mr. SPENCER. It was stated that that was the rumor. The word "rumor" is used in the testimony.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That Paul King had always counted that Mr. Ford was going to be a candidate. In another place he said it was rumored. That is the evidence.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator establishes my statement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. When the Senator says that it was generally understood that Ford was to be a candidate, and upon a record which says it was rumored to that effect, and that Paul King so concluded, he is about as accurate as to the record as he is as to the case generally.

Mr. SPENCER. If it will please the Senator, we will say that it was rumored over the State of Michigan.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But that is not the testimony—that it was rumored over the State of Michigan.

Mr. SPENCER. Where does the Senator think it was rumored—in some secret closet? Rumors do not so spring.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will answer the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. Rumors run like lightning; rumors spread from man to man, from locality to locality. A thing that is rumored about is general; it is not localized in a particular room. That is not what "rumor" means.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I appreciate the discourse of the able Senator from Missouri on rumors. That is all that Senators who favor Mr. Newberry have got to rest their case upon—rumors, mere rumors.

Now, let us see whether Henry Ford was the man whom Truman H. Newberry was after. Here is a letter from Mr. Newberry to the king-maker of Michigan, Paul King. He begins in this manner:

My dear Paul—

In his first letter he addressed him as "My dear Mr. King." That was on March 8. But he is warming up now as the money bags move upon Michigan and in this letter dated April 4, 1918, he draws a little nearer to his manager and addresses him as "My dear Paul," and then he says:

The question of Mr. Warner's candidacy or of anyone else besides Osborn is, of course, of the highest importance, but I can not avoid the thought that the main idea in the minds of many influential people and papers like the Free Press and the News, is anything to beat Osborn, and when you have impressed these papers and the public with the certain knowledge that I will continue in the race to a finish they will then have to decide whether they can beat Mr. Osborn better by urging another candidate to enter besides myself, or whether their best opportunity to beat Osborn would be to concentrate and cooperate with all the most satisfactory publicity that you have already given to me. It seems most probable from what I hear and from what you must know, that you have already covered so much ground that any investigation by those who want to back some one besides myself will certainly show that a division of the opposition to Osborn will certainly result in his election—

Mr. Ford is not even mentioned—

At the present writing I feel that you have secured for my candidacy what might be described as the inside track for the nomination.

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY.

So it was Mr. Osborn and not Henry Ford that Mr. Newberry had in mind.

Mr. President, in the next few years there are going to be several vacant seats in this body as a result of the vote on the Newberry case. It was true in the Lorimer case, and ought to have been, and it will be true of the Newberry case. Just how a Senator can make up his mind to stand here with his hands uplifted to God and swear to support the Constitution and defend it against all enemies, both foreign and domestic, and then vote to permit a millionaire to buy a seat in the Senate is beyond my comprehension.

Ah, Mr. President, some of the Republican Members of the Senate will not sit here and listen to the testimony now, but they will listen to it out in their States when the people back home demand to know why they voted to seat this man when the testimony showed that he obtained his seat by the unlawful and corrupt use of money.

Senators, the people out in the States will ask you who vote to permit this man to occupy a seat here: "You voted to seat this man, did you not?" "Yes." "He asked how much the primary would cost him, did he not?" "Yes." "Paul King told him $50,000, did he not?" "Yes." "And he went into the campaign with that understanding, did he not?" "Yes." "He knew he was violating the law of the State of Michigan, did he not?" "Yes." "He knew he was violating the Federal statute, did he not?" "Yes." "His brother admitted that he spent $100,000, did he not?" "Yes." "They spent vast sums of money, did they not?" "Yes." "They admitted that they spent over $200,000 to obtain the nomination, did they not?" "Yes." "And in spite of all that you voted to permit him to occupy a seat in the United States Senate?" "Yes." And then they will say, "You have proven yourself unfaithful, and by this act convinced us that you are no longer worthy to represent this State in the United States Senate."

Mr. President, I want to read you another letter from him about Mr. Osborn. Listen, Senators: I would that we had all of you over there. There are only five or six Republicans upon the other side while this great case is up for trial by the jury sent here from 48 sovereign States. Listen to what Mr. Newberry wrote on August 9. I do not want the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] to lecture on rumors any more. I want to read him some facts. They are written by Truman H. Newberry. He refused to talk, and I am sure that he is sorry he wrote.

Listen, you who have sworn at the altar place of this body to guard its sacred name from pollution and scandal, you who should look to the highest and best interest of the mass of the American people and protect them from the corrupt use of money in politics; you who have seen the evidence in various sections of how the greedy money power seeks to crowd out the poor man and the man of moderate means and put its agents to the front whenever a senatorial election is to be had—listen to this letter from Truman Newberry written to his manager about 15 days before the primary. It is dated August 9, 1918. At first he addressed him as "My dear Mr. King" and then as "My dear Paul," but now it is "Dear Paul"; and this is what he said:

DEAR PAUL: There is much more information about Osborn's present plight. I will tell you when I see you. The statement that he is short of ammunition is an absolute fact. Whether or not this was a feeler, I will leave to you to judge when I talk to you about it.

I have noticed Osborn's strength with the labor people, and, of course, do not understand it, but am thankful we have a fighting minority, which I hope has gained enough time to include my views in their circular of the workmen's publicity committee.

I am inclosing a copy of my noncommittal reply to the Grand Rapids people, which covers the situation in a rather flimsy manner.

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY.

Senators, do you get the significance of that letter? There is ex-Gov. Osborn, an able and distinguished citizen of Michigan. When free from the corrupting and corroding power of money in politics, he was honored with the high office of governor of that great Commonwealth. Here he is in a race for the Senate. A man of modest means in a contest with John Newberry, Truman Newberry, Joy, Victor Barnes, and the trust companies all combined, and Osborn is fighting by himself out in the open field, making a clean race, as he did when he was elected governor, and they are firing upon him from ambush and using their field guns hidden in the cliffs of Detroit and Wall Street to throw shells of corrupt campaign funds and thus beat him back and impede his progress. Candidate Truman Newberry looks upon his opponent's sad plight and chuckles as he reminds Paul King, his manager, that Osborn is down, prone upon the ground; his finances about exhausted; his ammunition gone. Keep firing on him, Paul.

Senators, are we ready to place the stamp of our approval upon such a slush-fund campaign as that?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, then we are asked to countenance and set the seal of approval upon the bizarre proposition that the sitting Member said in a letter that he knows all about Osborn's financial situation; he knows that Osborn is short of ammunition, but he knows nothing about his own case!

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, yes; he writes to Paul King, his manager, that he knows it to be a fact that Osborn's funds are exhausted. Senators, is it not rather strange that this man Newberry knew all about Osborn's finances in the primary campaign and knew nothing at all about his own? To ask us to accept such a theory is a reflection upon the intelligence of the Senate.

No doubt Paul King had his instructions from his chief to do whatever was necessary, to spend whatever amount of money he thought was necessary to get the primary nomination. Paul had heard of the money campaign conducted on behalf of Mr. Herrick up in Ohio. Mr. Herrick's manager routed every Republican candidate in the primary and secured for his chief the Republican nomination for the Senate as a candidate against the able and brave senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. So Paul King went up to see the manager of Mr. Herrick's campaign and he got all the points he could from him. The Newberry campaign was to be run on a large scale and Paul King wanted to learn all the tricks of the trade, so he journeyed over to Ohio to get pointers from a man who had done the "trick" in the Herrick campaign. Mr. President, I do not know how much he learned from the Ohio manager of Mr. Herrick's costly campaign, but I do know that leading Republicans and prominent newspapers in Michigan denounced the conduct of the Newberry campaign.

Mr. Truman H. Newberry wrote Paul King as follows:

I want to be successful in what I undertake, and I am in this campaign to a finish.

Does that look as if he was having nothing to do with his campaign? Again, he wrote Paul King:

I devour your reports.

Reports about what? About Truman Newberry's campaign for the Senate.

What did he say on the last day? Why, he said on August 26, 1918:

MY DEAR PAUL: * * *

While to-morrow's primary vote will record the result of your efforts, please know that every day I live will be a reminder of this obligation and debt to you—

Under obligations to him for what? Why, for managing his, Truman H. Newberry's, senatorial campaign—which I can never repay except when some fortunate hour arrives when I may reciprocate in actions instead of words this sense of real and deep thankfulness that I have such friends as you and the other gentlemen associated with you on your committee.

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY.

That letter was written after the newspapers of Michigan had complained about the extravagant and unlawful use of money in the Newberry campaign. It was written after an open letter had been addressed to Truman H. Newberry and published in the papers of Michigan calling his attention to the extravagant expenditures of campaign funds in his name, by his committee, in the primary in the State of Michigan. When was that letter written? It was written after the lieutenant governor of Michigan, a Republican, had himself written a letter to Mr. Newberry, addressed:

Hon. Truman H. Newberry, Brooklyn Navy Yard, New York.

They got his address wrong. They ought to have said, "Highland Park, on a wooden ship, out amongst the trees."

DEAR SIR: Men of all walks of life, who have the best interests of our State at heart, believe the men who are conducting your campaign for United States Senator are conducting one that will bring one of the greatest scandals on our State that Michigan politics ever saw and have asked me to take the lead in attempting to rid our State of this blight.

I note by your statement that you say you do not know of these things.

In giving you the information I will give you the terms that I hear everywhere in the 62 counties in which I have been recently. I have always had the highest regard for you and must believe you will relieve the Republican Party and the State of a campaign that is now being likened to the notorious Lorimer campaign of Illinois a few years ago. The terms "buddle" and "rotten" seem to be general terms that I hear.

Mr. President, it was so bold and brazen, so notorious and scandalous, that the lieutenant governor of the State dared the money power of Wall Street and Detroit, marched out upon the highest elevation overlooking the State and called on this man to stop this degrading, demoralizing, and debauching campaign. He said further:

Every section of the State shows evidence of an expensive newspaper campaign costing thousands and thousands of dollars. Thousands of men are liberally paid for work at many more thousands of dollars, an expensive suite of offices with a large force sending out hundreds of thousands of letters to influential voters at more thousands of dollars, thousands of autos already engaged for use on primary day at many more thousands; that practically every opponent of the primary system is backing your campaign; and that hundreds of the experts who have figured in or conducted for money the wet campaigns of the past are among the most active of your supporters.

Conservative estimates say everywhere from $250,000 to $500,000 is being used. The good people of the State are apparently powerless to give the voters these matters on short notice. In case you get the most votes you must expect to have the placing of your name on the election ballot contested.

Mr. STANLEY. Did he say "wet campaign" and refer to wet voters?

Mr. HEFLIN. That referred to a previous campaign.

Mr. STANLEY. The records show that this man contributed $10,000 to the Anti-Saloon League; so he must have been playing both ends against the middle.

Mr. HEFLIN. He was playing both ends against the middle. He was relying on the power of money to put him over and would doubtless contribute money to any cause that would get him votes.

The lieutenant governor continues:

I can not believe you understand the situation, and if you did you would come to the rescue. I am, therefore, asking you in behalf of the old Republican Party, clean politics, preservation of the primaries, social and business interest, to withdraw from this campaign and save the everlasting disgrace to the party and the State from a pollution that would stay for years. Hoping you may act favorably and retain the high esteem in which you have been held in the State, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

L. D. DICKINSON,
Lieutenant Governor of Michigan.

Would you say in the face of that letter written to Truman H. Newberry, the candidate, by the Republican lieutenant governor of Michigan, that Mr. Newberry did not know when he praised Paul King and thanked him for all that he had done, just what manner of campaign had been conducted in his name and in his behalf?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia? Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I would like to ask the Senator if he knows that Henry Ford employs 50,000 men in Detroit, and that he levied blackmail on those men to pay the expenses of his campaign?

Mr. HEFLIN. No, Mr. President, I never heard of such a thing. Henry Ford is not on trial here. This Senate must decide whether Truman H. Newberry—not Henry Ford—is entitled to a seat in this body.

Mr. President, I was reading letters from prominent Republicans of Michigan about their complaints with reference to the conduct of the Newberry campaign which was being carried on in that State. I had just called to the attention of Senators a letter from the lieutenant governor of that State. I now desire to read a line or two from an article written by Mr. William G. Simpson, of Michigan, to the citizens of Michigan and published in the newspapers of that State:

Personally, I refuse to believe other than in the old-fashioned goodness and honesty of the common people of Michigan.

If the evils of which Newberry and his friends are charged are allowed to continue, it means that we, the common people, must submit to rule by a class and that class the rich class. We therefore lose our much-vaunted democracy.

It is not a question of loyalty between parties. It is a question of common honesty, decency, and principles among men.

Does any Senator here believe that such charges could be made and published all over Michigan without Mr. Newberry's knowledge?

Do we need any more testimony to convince us that Mr. Newberry knew all about what was going on in his primary campaign?

They hired workers by the weeks and months. They flooded the Commonwealth of Michigan with his literature—spent money in various ways. They carried pictures of him in the moving-picture shows all over the State. He was standing on a wooden battleship up in a park, and it was so camouflaged that it looked like a sure-enough battleship. But, Mr. President, the ship that he was commanding was not upon the waves of the ocean; it was out upon the high land, far removed from the deadly missiles of the submarine.

What were they doing? They were merely feeding that out to the people of Michigan, filling the columns of the newspapers. One of the labor papers the day before the primary carried a whole page of Newberry matter. That cost a good deal of money, but it was said, "Spare no expense; go to it; keep our publicity at full pressure." What does that mean? "Do not neglect any paper; do not spare dollars and dimes; do not let anything interfere; go to it, and spread the news over Michigan; boost me; Osborn is down; he is wounded sore; his campaign funds are exhausted; he lies helpless upon the plain."

The statute of Michigan provides that not more than $3,750 can be spent for all purposes in a senatorial primary and yet the friends of Mr. Newberry admit that more than $200,000 were expended in his primary campaign. The Congress of the United States said, "You can not spend more than $10,000 in a senatorial primary"; and it is admitted nineteen times that amount was expended in the Newberry campaign. How are you going to get around this testimony, Senators?

Are you going deliberately to set a precedent by your vote that men can go out and spend money in unlimited amounts in any way in order to secure the nomination, just so they do not actually buy the votes? Are you going to take the position that they can offer men fabulous sums in order to secure their employment and get the weight of their influence, and then say that they did not do it illegally because it can not be proven that they actually corrupted the man by buying his vote? When you do that you put a premium on the extravagant use of money in senatorial campaigns and you invite the corrupt use of money in politics, and you make it almost impossible for a man of moderate means to obtain a seat in the Senate. Do you want to do that?

Senators, if you seat this man in the face of the testimony in this case, you are going to have a hard time explaining your vote to the people who sent you here. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will carry into 435 congressional districts in all the States of the Union enough of the argument and the testimony to convince everyone who reads them that the extravagant, wrongful, and unlawful use of money procured the primary nomination for Truman Newberry.

We are going to do one of two things—condemn such an unlawful and corrupt use of money in politics or openly approve it.

Mr. Newberry is accused of a very serious offense; his campaign, we are told, was a stench in the nostrils of the people of Michigan, and they cried out against it.

The grand jury in Michigan indicted Mr. Newberry and he employed as one of his attorneys Martin Littleton, of New York, one of the very best criminal lawyers in the United States. When the facts in the case were submitted to the Newberry lawyers, I imagine that they all said there is only one thing that will prevent the conviction of Mr. Newberry, and that is for him to say, and for everybody else connected with his campaign to say, that he knew nothing about it and had nothing to do with the campaign. So that course was pursued. Paul King was called to the witness stand, and they thought that he was so popular politically with the powers that be that whatever he said would go. But not so. The sworn jurors who sat and listened to him said in their hearts, "This thing has got to stop; the securing a nomination to the Senate for the man who has the most money shall not be permitted in Michigan," and they convicted not only Mr. Newberry but Paul King and the others connected with that campaign.

Mr. Newberry's lawyers took an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court, in a decision with which I do not agree, decided by a vote of five to four that Congress could not limit the expenditure of money in a senatorial primary. The other four members of that court held that we could. The court did not express any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of Truman H. Newberry, but left the question of his eligibility or fitness for a seat in the Senate to be decided by the Senate itself. The Michigan statute limiting campaign expenditures in a senatorial primary is still the law. The law of fair play and common decency in political contests is still in existence. The right of the Senate to protect itself and the American people against the corrupting influence of money in politics, thank God, can still be invoked.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was not what the Supreme Court decided substantially this: We have nothing to do with the merits of the case; we have nothing to do with the facts in the case. We merely decide that we have no jurisdiction because the Federal primary law had been declared unconstitutional?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; that is the exact situation.

I had just made the point that the Senator from Mississippi suggested, but he did not hear me. What he is stating is what the court decided. The court said: "The Congress is not without power to defend itself; it is the business of the Senate," that is the substance of what the court said, "to say whether or not this man, under the circumstances, shall have a seat in that body."

Senators, are you going to ask Mr. Newberry any questions? No. He would probably resent such a thing.

So you can ask anybody else and everybody else about everything else, but you can not interrogate a millionaire about buying a seat in the United States Senate. And I repeat, the majority members of the Senate committee declined to request him to come before the committee to make a statement and permit other Senators to ask him questions. Senators, you can not excuse such conduct.

At this point Mr. HEFLIN announced, before yielding the floor, that he would conclude his speech the next morning.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] for a moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the Senator a question for information. When the Senator, or, rather, when the contestee from Michigan, declined to appear before the committee and declined to be heard in his own behalf, did he give any reason for it? Did he take refuge? I thought perhaps he took refuge in the statute which says that a criminal may not be compelled to testify against himself. Did he ever make that plea? I am not familiar with the record.

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, I know that he did not go before the committee, and I do know that he did not testify in the court in Michigan, and that he did not testify before the committee here, and that the minority asked that he be produced, and the majority declined to produce him or to invite him to appear.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a principle of criminal law that a criminal can not be called upon to testify against himself, he can not be made a witness in his own case against his will, and in my innocence, and folly, perhaps, I thought maybe the Senator from Michigan had invoked the protection of that statute.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has made a statement which I do not think ought to stand just as he made it, and upon reflection I do not believe he will want it to stand. He refers to some statute, stating that a criminal shall not be compelled to testify against himself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to correct that by saying "a defendant," because the question of criminality has not been settled until the case is settled. But it is a principle of criminal law that a defendant can not be made a witness except with his own consent, and this particular defendant, the contestee, has not been made a witness, even though requested by the other side, and I merely wanted to know whether he was hiding himself behind the spirit of that statute.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, the object of the Senator was perfectly apparent, but I do not know what statute he refers to, whether it is some State statute or all State statutes of a similar nature. I do not think the ordinary language of those statutes excludes the word "defendant" even. The language is that no person shall be required to testify against himself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I acknowledge that to be correct. Suppose we call him a person, this particular person.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, my good friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], with whom I had the honor of serving in the House a few years ago, raised the question here a day or two ago as to whether we had a right to inquire into the conduct of a senatorial primary. He was not in the Chamber at the time I discussed this feature of the case yesterday, and that is why I mention it again at this time.

I wish to call his attention to the fact that the resolution which authorized this committee to investigate the Newberry case provided in part as follows:

It is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the said charges and countercharges of excessive and illegal expenditures of money and of unlawful practices in connection with the said election of a Senator from the State of Michigan, including the proceedings for the nomination of candidates at the primary.

In that connection I wish to call attention to a letter from ex-Gov. Osborn, who, himself, was a candidate for the Republican nomination. He had been a governor of that State and was a candidate in the primary against Mr. Newberry. He was referred to in letters from Mr. Newberry to Paul King, and Mr. Newberry showed delight at the fact that Osborn's financial condition was poor. He said his ammunition was about out. When the primary was over this Republican ex-governor of the State of Michigan wrote Mr. Newberry a letter, in which he practically said, "I am going to vote for you just because you have the nomination." In that letter he condemns the method that Mr. Newberry employed to secure the nomination. In that letter he accuses Mr. Newberry of violating the law.

Mr. President, that is an awful indictment against this man. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] that if they can go out and proceed early in the primary fight to buy up newspapers, to poison public sentiment, to gain favor amongst the reading public by a propaganda that they spread over the State day after day, week after week, and month after month, costing thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars, how can the average man compete with such a candidate? How long will it be before the senatorial doors will be absolutely closed to the man of moderate means, the candidate of merit, the man of ability, the man of sterling manhood, the man of right principle?

Are all of these things to be swamped by a money propaganda carried on by the man of millions? His pictures were in all the newspapers, uniform on like an admiral upon a ship, flooding the State with pleasing stories going into the newspapers day after day, costing thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars. Are we going to close our eyes to conduct like that? In my State the nomination is equivalent to election, as is the nomination on the Republican ticket for the Senate in Michigan. Are we going to encourage the candidate of any party to flood the State with money, buy up and obtain the support of certain newspapers, hire agents, establish ward leaders and precinct captains, and flood the State with his propaganda day in and day out, week in and week out for months in order to swamp, literally swamp, any other candidate, and thus obtain the nomination to the Senate for himself? Then the plain Republican or Democrat, honest, sincere patriot, has to stand aside for the man who has no qualification for the office of Senator, but relies solely upon his money.

Senators, there are two important steps to take in order to get a seat in this body. One is to obtain the nomination; the other is to win the election. If a man will debauch the voters to obtain the nomination, use unfair and foul means to obtain the nomination, there ought to be a rule in this body that will say to him "You may be able to corruptly manipulate the primary in your own State; you may be able by the unlawful use of large sums of money to secure the nomination, but remember whenever you spend money wrongfully and lavishly like that to secure the nomination, you are not going to cross the threshold of this Chamber, because we will guard the good name, the honor, and the integrity of this body and stand with drawn swords against you when you present your bought credentials at the door of the United States Senate."

Senators, there ought not to be any division in this Chamber upon this question. There ought to be 95 votes cast here to declare this seat vacant. The pity is that that is not the case.

Mr. President, they undertook to bring up Henry Ford as a bugaboo in this case. "Oh, it is Henry Ford." It was said that some wanted to get Henry Ford in the Senate and some wanted to keep Newberry out. That was not what Mr. Newberry said in his letter to Paul King to which I referred briefly on yesterday. I wish to refer to that letter to-day in connection with my reference to ex-Gov. Osborn. This letter was written by Mr. Newberry on the 4th of April, 1918, to Mr. Paul King, his manager:

The question of Mr. Warner's candidacy or anyone else beside Osborn is, of course, of the highest importance, but I can not avoid the thought that the main idea in the minds of many influential people and papers like the Free Press and the News is anything to beat Osborn—

Did you get that, Senators—not Henry Ford but Osborn—and when you have impressed these papers and the public with the certain knowledge that I will continue in the race to a finish, they will then have to decide whether they can beat Mr. Osborn better by urging another candidate to enter beside myself, or whether their best opportunity to beat Osborn would be to concentrate and cooperate with all the most satisfactory publicity that you have already given to me. It seems most probable from what I hear and from what you must know, that you have already covered so much ground, that any investigation by those who want to back some one beside myself will certainly show that a division of the opposition to Osborn will certainly result in his election. At the present writing I feel that you have secured for my candidacy what might be described as the inside track for the nomination.

This letter, as I said before, was written by Truman H. Newberry to Paul King, his manager.

Senators, this letter was written by the man who said in a written statement to the Secretary of the Senate that he had had nothing whatever to do with his own campaign. He compliments his manager for having covered the ground so thoroughly and tells him, in substance: "If you will see these people and bring to their attention what I am doing, how my candidacy is progressing, they will rally to me as the man who can best beat Osborn." Henry Ford was not thought of and was not mentioned in that letter.

A little later on, to show what Mr. Newberry thought about money and the part money was playing in the campaign, he wrote to Paul King about finances. This was on August 9, about 15 days before the primary:

DEAR PAUL: There is much more information about Osborn's present plight I will tell you when I see you.

Tell him about what? He swore that he had nothing whatever to do with his campaign.

The statement that he (Osborn) is short of ammunition is an absolute fact.

It is very evident that he had made inquiry of somebody who knew about Mr. Osborn's financial condition, and his statement to Paul King regarding it shows that he was relying on money to secure for him the nomination, and it appears that he wanted Paul King to put out the report that Osborn did not have any money and therefore would not be able to do much in the campaign.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, pardon my innocence, but he used the word "ammunition"?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes—ammunition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What did he mean by that?

Mr. HEFLIN. You see, he was a commander, for a while, of a wooden battleship out in a park in New York, and he thought of ammunition—not the kind used by the guns of a real battleship, but he was thinking of the kind of ammunition that his brother John and other relatives were carrying by the thousands and tens of thousands of dollars into the State of Michigan to be used in securing for him the nomination for the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from Alabama mean to tell me that even a naval officer thinks in terms of money when he is mentioning ammunition?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; not a naval officer. I am speaking of the commander of the wooden ship in the park.

Mr. President, he rejoiced at the financial straits of his opponent, Mr. Osborn. Did Senators ever read Eliza Cook's story about the carrion crow, how across the plain and into the mountain he follows the deer suffering from pains produced by the arrow that pierced his side and growing weaker and weaker from the loss of blood until, his strength gone, he falls upon the ground; and then the carrion crow, chirping notes of triumph, pounces upon the stricken deer and feeds upon his body? Here is a candidate for the United States Senate gloating over the fact that his opponent, ex-Gov. Osborn, a high-toned, honorable man, is fallen upon the plain, his finances exhausted, his ammunition gone.

He can not stand up against Newberry in the battle of dollars. Pounce upon him, Paul! Rejoice and be glad! He is too weak and feeble to do much more in this race.

I want to see my good friend, the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], vote right on this question. I do not believe that he will cast his vote to seat Mr. Newberry after he has read the testimony and heard the arguments in this case. I believe that he and others will be convinced that Mr. Truman H. Newberry knew about the unfair and unlawful methods employed to secure for him the senatorial nomination; that he approved those methods, contributed to and had to do with the management of his campaign. Again I say, a precinct jury and a justice of the peace would have no trouble, in the face of the testimony in this case, in placing the responsibility for the conduct of the Newberry campaign right where it belongs and of making it clear that Mr. Newberry was not entitled to a seat in the United States Senate.

The effort to shield Mr. Newberry is seen in the testimony of every witness who was connected with the senatorial campaign of Mr. Newberry. Let me invite your attention to a Mr. Phillips, who was one of the publicity agents in the Newberry campaign. He testified before the Senate committee:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you see Mr. Truman H. Newberry in the pursuance of your work?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I did.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Where?

Mr. PHILLIPS. In New York City.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. How many times?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Several times; perhaps a dozen or more.

Yet Mr. Newberry swore to a statement filed with the Secretary of the Senate that he had nothing whatever to do with this campaign.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. How did you come to see him?

Mr. PHILLIPS. At the suggestion of Mr. King I made—I think it was four trips to New York City.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. What work did you do with Mr. Newberry?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I did very little work with Mr. Newberry aside from taking some motion pictures of Mr. Newberry, or directing having them taken.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you write up the advertising in his—

Mr. PHILLIPS. I did not.

He did not wait for Mr. Lucking to finish the question, and he did not know what Mr. Lucking was going to ask him, but he answered, "I did not." How quick and clever he is.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. From what he furnished you, or at least the points he furnished you?

Mr. PHILLIPS. No, sir; I did not. I talked to Senator Newberry on an automobile ride one evening, and from what I gathered of his past life I wrote certain publicity.

Mr. President, in their efforts to keep Mr. Newberry in the background out of touch with and far removed from the senatorial campaign they have made themselves and the candidate to appear absolutely ridiculous.

Let me continue with Mr. Phillips. Listen to this:

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. When was that?

Mr. PHILLIPS. On the occasion of my first visit. I think it occurred about June 1.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. 1918?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You went down to get the information for your publicity from him?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you tell him so?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I did not.

Did you ever hear of such a muffle-mouthed and mysterious campaign?

Listen to this:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did he know what you were getting it for?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not know.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. He did not know what you were there for?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not know whether he knew or not.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You did not tell him you were there for any such purpose?

Mr. PHILLIPS. No, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did he know what you were getting moving pictures of him for?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not know.

Oh, Mr. President, they would have the Senate believe that they led him around and stood him up like a dummy and posed him for moving pictures for use in his campaign and he did not know what they were doing to him or with him. They would have us believe—although Paul King sent Phillips, the Newberry publicity agent, up to see Mr. Newberry to get from him information and data to be used in an article to be published in the newspapers of Michigan—that Mr. Newberry did not know that he was being interviewed, that he did not know that the information given by him to his publicity agent was going to be used in his campaign. I wonder if there is one Senator here who believes that any such thing ever occurred. As the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] says, of course no such thing happened.

Why, Mr. President, they tell us that they displayed all over Michigan moving pictures of Mr. Newberry standing on the deck of the wooden battleship, which was made to appear as a real battleship. Did he know that those pictures were going to be used and that deception practiced upon the people of Michigan? Listen to this:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you suggest to him [Newberry] moving pictures?

Mr. PHILLIPS. No, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did he tell you who did?

Mr. PHILLIPS. No, sir.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you get any moving pictures of him?
 Mr. PHILLIPS. Yes, sir.
 Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. With his consent?
 Mr. PHILLIPS. Yes, sir.
 Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You say he did not know what it was for?
 Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not know.
 Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did he know it was for his campaign?
 Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not know.
 Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did he know you were on the committee?
 Mr. PHILLIPS. I imagine he did.

We must all admit that while Phillips seems to have no definite knowledge about anything he has a vivid imagination, for he says positively that he imagines that Mr. Newberry knew that he, Phillips, was on the Newberry committee. It is fortunate that Phillips has an imagination. But listen to this:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. You do not even know that?
 Mr. PHILLIPS. No, sir.
 Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did you know you were going for the ride?
 Mr. PHILLIPS. I did not know that.
 Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. How did he come to invite you for a ride?
 Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. King and Mr. Sibben and myself went to New York and arrived on Sunday morning, and Sunday evening when Mr. King and Mr. Sibben were returning from New York he said, "The Senator is going to take you for a motor ride," and he did take me for a motor ride.
 Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did Mr. King say that in the presence of the Senator?
 Mr. PHILLIPS. No, sir; he did not.

Even the motor ride is cloaked in mystery and secrecy. They do not want the truth told about Mr. Newberry's joy ride with an imaginative genius by the name of Phillips, who knows not anything.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—
 The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.
 Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama whether he is sure that he is not making a mistake in identity? He says he is quoting from the testimony of a Mr. Phillips. It strikes me that it must have been about a 9 or 10 year old girl who was just picked up to take an automobile ride, and, of course, was glad to take it regardless of what might occur. Is the Senator sure that the record shows that it was Mr. Phillips?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes, Mr. President; but there is not a 5-year-old girl in the country who knows as little as Phillips appears to know.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was he grown?
 Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, yes; he was grown. He could write and talk and walk and ride, too, with Truman H. Newberry without either one of them knowing what they were doing. Now, let me proceed:

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. What was there about this film or motion picture that you took?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. King told me that he had made arrangements with some New York man—I do not know who he was—to make motion pictures of the Senator; that the arrangements had not gone through as they planned, and asked me to go to New York and see that the pictures were made.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. Did Senator Newberry pose in your presence?
 Senator WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. On the battleship in the park?
 Mr. PHILLIPS. The wooden battleship; yes.

In another place Phillips said that it was an imitation ship, a fake battleship.

Mr. President, we are told that in all the moving-picture shows of Michigan this fake wooden battleship floated across the screen, and there, in all his glory, stood Candidate Newberry, clad in his uniform and peering through his glasses as if looking for an enemy ship at sea. Those pictures were made for use in the Newberry campaign in Michigan. They were used in the Newberry campaign. Can a man arrange to have moving pictures made of himself for use in his own campaign and then pose for the pictures which are used in his own campaign and then tell the truth when he says that he had nothing whatever to do with his campaign?

O consistency, thou art a jewel.
 While they were misrepresenting Henry Ford and trying to make him out an enemy to his country he was devoting his time and the energy of his great industrial plants to making war implements and contributing as best he could to the winning of the war, and he, as I have said before, was letting the Government have that material at cost. Mr. Newberry and Mr. Templeton were selling the Government vast quantities of war materials, but there is no evidence to the effect that they sold them at cost.

And where was Mr. Newberry then? He was standing erect and in his uniform on the deck of a fake wooden battleship in New York, posing for moving pictures to be used in his senatorial campaign in Michigan.

As he stood there upon the deck of that wooden ship a look of senatorial ambition was depicted on his face and the light of boodle battle was in his eye as he gave the command, "Take your places on the deck, and don't forget to bring your check." And there he stood in calm magnificence.

Oh, Mr. President, I am reminded of the thrill that came to me when I first heard recited, "The boy stood on the burning deck, whence all but him had fled," and "How the flames rolled on and he would not go." But here is a picture of a man robed in all the habiliments of a warrior ready to do and die. Four-square he stood to every wind that blew. Alone, but undaunted he stood upon the deck of his fake battleship out in the park, defying noisy, chirping English sparrows and angry chattering squirrels.

Selling the Government war materials at magnificent prices and posing on a fake battleship for moving pictures for his senatorial campaign in Michigan while his brother John is shoveling the shekels into the campaign fund at Detroit. Will even Paul King deny that for real courage and service of a high order here is a picture whose beautiful suggestiveness is enough to make it immortal in the annals of senatorial contests in the United States?

Admiral Dewey's immortal words to Gridley were, "Fire when you are ready, Gridley." How different the words of the candidate commander of the fake wooden battleship in the park. Listen, "Keep firing, Paul! The enemy (Osborn) has exhausted his ammunition. Keep our publicity going at full pressure," and that publicity was costing thousands of dollars every day. "My lips are sealed. Let money talk for me—say it with dollars! Keep on firing! Fire through your newspaper columns! Fire through your circulars! Fire through your hired agents! Fire through your precinct captains and your ward and beat leaders! Let the battle rage, Paul! Osborn is penniless—my money is plentiful and I have just begun to fight."

And again he stood four square to every campaign wind that blew from the senatorial battle up in Michigan.

Mr. President, there are many queer and very remarkable things revealed in this Newberry campaign. I want to read at this point a line from Mr. Newberry's agent, Fred P. Smith. He sent a telegram to Mr. Newberry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before that is read I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield to my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does he not think this accusation is rather cruel? Does he not really think that Truman Newberry was just a perfectly innocent little child whom everybody was robbing and taking money from, and he did not know why, and they did not tell him why? Is the Senator dead certain that he knew he was running for the Senate at all?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I believe that he knew, because he sent for Paul King and asked him what it would cost, and Paul told him $50,000 and upward, and he started in with that understanding.

Here is the telegram that was sent by Fred P. Smith, the confidential man, the special agent of Truman Newberry and John Newberry; and again I say he had power of attorney to draw checks on Truman Newberry's account and John Newberry's account, and he did so. Now, listen to this telegram:

Detroit, Mich., July 28, 1919.—Lieut. Truman H. Newberry, third naval district, 280 Broadway, New York.

Not far from his wooden ship.

I misinformed you this morning the date of close of regular expenses. Should have said August 27. The circular work, advertising, clerical help, postage, and all regular overhead expenses will naturally continue until primary. Have written.

FRED P. SMITH.

And yet Mr. Newberry stated under oath to the Secretary of the Senate that he had nothing whatever to do with his campaign; and here is his agent, his confidential man, wiring him about the expenses of the Newberry campaign and letting him know that he can continue to spend money right on until primary day.

What are you going to do with that, Senators? It wouldn't take a precinct jury and a justice of the peace long to reach a true verdict in this case.

Let us see, then, whose money was used in the campaign of Truman Newberry. The testimony shows that Mr. Truman Newberry was talking to Mr. Fred P. Smith, his agent, about their transferring too much money from his account to somebody else's account, which was a complaint that they were using his money altogether and not helping him as freely as they promised they would.

Now, Mr. Lucking says:

And his funds, as well as his brother's, were used?

Listen, Senators.

Mr. SMITH. And everybody else's.

Whom did he mean by that? He meant the whole Newberry brigade—John Newberry and his wife, and Joy and his wife, and Barnes and his wife, and Truman Newberry. Would you want it any plainer? He said, Truman Newberry's money and everybody else's. There can not be any denial about who furnished this money, Senators, and that Truman H. Newberry had a hand in this thing from beginning to end.

Mr. President, I want to call attention in this connection to a remarkable incident. I have already mentioned the fact that Mr. Newberry never testified himself at his trial in Michigan. He declined. He never testified here. Paul King, the manager for Mr. Newberry, did testify in court in Michigan; and just when the attorneys who were prosecuting wanted to ask him questions, he collapsed, got sick, left the witness stand, and they were never permitted to ask him a single question.

He told his story just like he wanted to tell it, and he got sick just when he was going to be cross-questioned.

What about this man Emery? As the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] said at the hearings before the Senate committee, the matter of handling money and checks was mainly up to Mr. Emery. Well, that is largely true; and where is Mr. Emery? Mr. Emery never has been heard. They tell us that he was sick; that they could not get his testimony. They never did get him before the Senate committee, and the man who knew more about the financial transactions than anybody else has not testified in this case. Then we asked, "Where are the books; where are the documents that show these transactions? Where are the checks that were paid? Where are the stubs of the checks? Where are the vouchers? Let us have them, and go into this case, and ascertain the truth," and they said, "They have all been destroyed," and they covered up their tracks; and, Mr. President, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] suggests, that is an additional reason why Mr. Newberry himself should be called upon and required to testify.

This is the most mysterious case that was ever considered by the Senate. The Lorimer case does not touch it. The Stephenson case is not in its class. It is without an exact parallel in the history of senatorial contests in this body.

Why, they admit spending $200,000. Let me remind the Senate again that that is 52 times more than the State of Michigan permits, 19 times as much as the Federal statute permitted, and it was in force and effect at that time. It is the general belief among many who were in close touch with that campaign that it cost anywhere from $250,000 to $500,000. Who said so? The lieutenant governor of Michigan, Gov. Dickinson, a Republican, said so in a letter to Mr. Newberry. He said, "Your campaign, it is said, has cost anywhere from $250,000 to $500,000," and Mr. Newberry never denied a line of it.

Senators, I want to read you here what one of our editors says about this Newberry case. I have forgotten what paper I got this from. I failed to note the name of the paper and the date; but here is the eternal doctrine that it proclaims:

But it does materially matter that the Senate is so negligent of its reputation, so indifferent to decent public opinion, flouted and offended by this unprecedented purchase of office, that it first admits to its membership one thoroughly discredited and unworthy, and then insults the intelligence of the country with preposterous and exasperating bunk.

The idea of trying to foist this thing upon the Senate and the American people, without testimony showing the innocence of this man, when we have here many pages of testimony containing a straightforward recount of facts and circumstances that connect him up with the campaign and tie him body and soul to its corrupt and scandalous conduct.

Truman H. Newberry sent for Paul King and Paul King told him that the senatorial race would cost him upward of $50,000. In possession of that information he entered the race knowing perfectly well that it was going to cost a lot of money. His brother spent about $100,000 for him. His confidential agent says that he checked money out of the fund where money belonging to both Truman and John Newberry was deposited. The case is proven; it is established beyond a doubt that he is guilty.

And what did Paul King, Mr. Newberry's manager, say about his conduct of the campaign? He said, "I did whatever I thought was necessary to be done, without regard to expense."

Mr. President, do Senators get the full significance of that? "The limitations fixed by the law of Michigan do not deter me. Metes and bounds established by the Federal statute do not deter me in the least. I do not permit any moral standard or the good of the country to deter me. I do whatever I think is necessary to get the nomination for Truman H. Newberry without regard to the amount of money that it takes." Senators, what are you going to do with that?

Mr. President, if all the facts were known, I believe they would disclose testimony showing the expenditure of money in the senatorial campaign of Mr. Newberry amounting to between $500,000 and a million dollars. The idea of relying upon money seemed to be the controlling thought in all that was done and said.

May I remind you again of what Mr. Cody said to Mr. Hayden here in Washington when Mr. Newberry sent him down to see if Mr. Hayden could be induced to take charge of his campaign? Mr. Hayden did not enthuse over the suggestion, whereupon Cody told him in substance, "The sum that will be offered you will be so fabulous that you can not afford to decline it." Money, money was the thing relied on from beginning to end.

Then what happened? I imagine from what I read about this case that some one scented the trail of the Newberry cash and suggested that with strong and sufficient financial inducement Paul King could be persuaded to take charge of the senatorial campaign for Mr. Newberry, and that he was the man who could, with sufficient cash, put it over. He brought the nomination back to Mr. Newberry. Then what did Mr. Newberry, through his counsel, say? He said, "It was the most perfect organization, the best political machine, ever established in the State of Michigan," boasting about it.

Now, let me propound this question to Senators: If Mr. Truman H. Newberry would make an offer to Mr. Hayden in the early stages of the game so flattering from a financial standpoint that it was thought by Cody that he could not decline it, what must have been the fabulous sum that he paid to Paul King, who managed the campaign successfully and who bore the nomination back to him covered all over with the dollar marks of a boodle campaign?

One witness said, "I went into the office of Paul King"—Mr. Newberry's manager—"and there I saw a table 2½ feet wide and 3 feet long, covered with $10, $20, $50, and $100 bills arranged in stacks."

Senators, are you ready to say by your votes that that dangerous and degrading method of selecting a United States Senator is the proper method and has your approval?

Mr. Newberry told Paul King to keep "our publicity going at full pressure," and Paul said, "I have got 201 newspapers supporting you now and I am carrying a full-page advertisement in the labor paper the day before the primary. I am doing whatever I think is necessary without regard to cost," and the boodle campaign raged in the senatorial race in Michigan.

Consideration for true worth and statesmanship was stifled; the rules of common decency and fair play were ignored or forgotten. The corrupt use of money was the dominating note, while the Newberry headquarters was a clearing house for political tradesmen.

In the language of Thomas Moore:

Like Jove of old,
They turn their thunder into showers of gold,
Whose silent courtship wins securer joys;
Taints by degrees and ruins without noise.

No man here or elsewhere can truthfully say that Truman Newberry would have received the nomination to the Senate if he had not resorted to the extravagant and unlawful expenditure of money.

And it follows as the night the day that no Senator here can vote to seat him without approving the method employed to secure that nomination. Senators' wealth is already getting a strong hold upon a portion of this body. I do not want to see the Senate become a millionaire's club, and I pray God that it may never become the rendezvous of sinister interests and predatory wealth. There should be no division among us upon the Newberry case. Our decision in this case is going to be instrumental in discouraging and preventing the extravagant and unlawful use of money in the selection of a United States Senator or it is going to invite and encourage men of large wealth to debauch the voter, make barter of the ballot, and acquire seats in this body by the sheer use of money.

The main thing for Mr. Newberry to do is to come to the bar of the Senate and say, "Senators, I am accused of having transgressed the proprieties, of violating the law, and of committing grievous wrongs in obtaining the nomination to the United States Senate from the State of Michigan. Minority members of the Senate committee charged with the duty and responsibility of investigating the charges against me hold that I am not entitled to a seat in this body. The majority members of the same committee, while recommending that I be seated, criticize and condemn the amount of money expended in securing for me the primary nomination to the Senate. In view of these things I realize that there is reason for the charge that a cloud rests upon my title, and I therefore desire to announce to the Senate my purpose to relieve the Senate from further embarrassment by resigning and going back to Michigan and submitting my claims for vindication in a primary, where I intend to see that no unfair or foul means are employed."

That is what he should do. Instead of doing that he employs able lawyers at great expense to represent him before the committee and declines to even go before the committee to say one word in defense of his claim to a seat in this body.

Mr. President, this man with his millions may think that he can buy and hold a seat here as he would a seat on the New York Stock Exchange. You can pay so many thousand dollars down and buy a seat on the stock exchange. Senators, are you ready to place the stamp of your approval upon the sale of a seat in the United States Senate? God forbid that the Senate shall ever so degenerate as to do such a thing.

Does any Senator here believe that John Newberry, the brother and business partner of Truman H. Newberry, contributed $100,000 to his brother's senatorial campaign and that never during all that time said one word to his brother about his race for the Senate? It is as unnatural as it is untrue.

Does any Senator here believe that Templeton, the business partner of Truman H. Newberry and chairman of the Newberry senatorial campaign committee at Detroit, went to New York, saw Mr. Newberry and talked with him, without ever mentioning the senatorial campaign to him? Such a contention is absurd and ridiculous. And yet we are asked to seat Mr. Newberry in the Senate of the United States upon just such testimony as that.

It does not take the eye of a trained lawyer to see that the witnesses for Mr. Newberry were all keeping in mind the statement that he filed under oath with the Secretary of the Senate that he had nothing whatever to do with his campaign and that none of the money was advanced with his knowledge or consent.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. My accomplished colleague has said that Truman Newberry testified.

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not mean Truman; I meant John.

Mr. STANLEY. I think Truman is deaf and dumb. We have had blind men in the Senate, but we never had a deaf and dumb man before Truman. He never testified, and he never will.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know whether he could hear or not. The Bible tells us about men who having eyes see not and having ears hear not. Truman must be in that category, because he saw his brother, but never heard him speak about doing anything to help him in his campaign for the United States Senate, nor did he talk with his brother or anybody else about it. He stood afar off, on the deck of his wooden ship. The names of witnesses are given who swore that he was in Michigan, in Detroit, during the campaign. That is set out in Henry Ford's brief.

They saw him in the office of Paul King. Paul King, in his testimony, referred to the time when the newspapers of Michigan opened up on them. What were those newspapers doing? They were crying out against the conduct of that corrupt and scandalous campaign.

Is not that a confession that the Newberry campaign was so ugly and odious that the newspapers felt it necessary to criticize and condemn it?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I know that my genial friend would not do Mr. Newberry an injustice. He talks about that wooden ship being out in the woods. I was going through Central Park not long ago and they pointed out to me a little lake about as large as the Capitol building, or somewhat larger. They also pointed out the place where the papier-mâché ship upon which Commander Newberry had stood was anchored. They tell me that the Senator from Alabama has done him a great injustice, that it was not a wooden ship, that it was a papier-mâché ship; that it had things on it that looked like guns and turrets, and the picture shows it as a battleship on the sea. I am certain that the Senator, if he would examine the film, would find that he was really near water, that the ship appeared to be a battleship, and he looked like he was facing all kinds of danger. I am also told that they have this funny kind of powder that is burned and which makes much smoke, and they had the smoke there apparently and things that looked like hostile ships all around it, and the boy who stood on the burning deck was not in anything like the danger that Newberry was in from the smoke of this calcium powder that floated all around him while he stood like the boy, whence all but him had fled.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my brilliant friend from Kentucky. This battleship might have been near the water, but it is like that little doggerel the Senator quoted here the other day.

Mother, may I go out to swim?

Yes; my darling daughter:

Hang your clothes on a hickory limb,

But don't go near the water.

His witness, Phillips, testified that it was a fake battleship. My friend has pictured a paper concern built down near the water. It was said that this thing did look like a ship on the water, and it was really intended to impress the voters of Michigan that it was a real battleship, and that he was the commander standing on it. He was a successful commander, too, in gathering ammunition for his campaign up in Michigan.

"Take your stand upon the deck and don't forget to bring your check." Every fellow that boarded that ship had that instruction, and they brought the checks, and they got enough of them when accumulated to do the dirty work in Michigan to procure, through the lavish and wrongful use of money, a nomination which meant a passport up the road toward the Senate, not into but toward it, because there is another threshold to cross here before he can have and hold a seat in this body.

Why do certain big-moneyed interests want men they can control in this body? I will cite an instance. Just a few days ago I saw Mr. Newberry vote against allowing the Government to use the excess-profits tax to pay the soldiers who saved the Nation's life in the hour of its peril. He voted against allowing the Government to use that money to make a fair and just settlement with the soldiers, when 500,000 of them were out of employment. Does that give an idea as to why they want to control this body? Mr. President, if the day ever comes when they can control a majority in the Senate, it will not make any difference then whom we elect to the House, they can pass a bill unanimously over there, and it will find its death chamber here where purchased privilege and power will send it to its long last sleep. Sinister interests are fighting for control here. There is rarely now an election of Senator in any State in the Union that they do not in some way seek to elect one to their liking.

This is a small body when compared to the House. It has just 96 Members, and if they can control the votes of 49 of them they will have a majority and then they can block any legislation, I do not care how necessary or meritorious it may be. They can shape and control the destiny of the Nation by having and controlling 49 votes in this body.

Senators, are we by our votes going to do that which everybody knows is against the best interests of the American people and at the same time prove ourselves unworthy and unfaithful guardians of the good name, the honor, and integrity of the Senate?

Mr. President, one of the things necessary to wholesome, healthful government is a free press. The press must be kept free and untrammelled. Paul King tempted certain newspapers in Michigan and committed vicious dollar assaults upon the freedom of her press. Paul King's campaign motto was: "Whatever I think should be done for Mr. Newberry, I do it without regard to cost. I have already got 201 newspapers actively supporting you and I am going after the other 300 and more." Imagine Paul King calling on a moderately well-to-do newspaper man in Michigan and asking him to support Mr. Newberry and hear the newspaper man say, "Well, I had about decided to support ex-Gov. Osborn. He made us a good governor and he is a very able, clean man."

PAUL KING. Well, do not make up your mind. Suppose we were to take some advertising space with you—say, $500 worth—would that help the situation?

Then, almost too dumbfounded for utterance, Paul's victim said, "Say that again, and say it slow."

Why, Mr. President, Paul King wrote to Mr. Newberry that the labor situation at a certain point was improving, and said he was going over there and take a page advertisement in the labor paper the day before the primary. Thousands upon top of thousands and even hundreds of thousands of money was so spent to purchase newspapers and mold public sentiment.

Lieut. Gov. Dickinson of Michigan himself wrote to Truman H. Newberry, "It is estimated that you have spent from $250,000 to $500,000," and Mr. Newberry declined to go before the Senate committee and deny the charge made by the lieutenant governor of Michigan.

Just here, Mr. President, I want to read a few lines from a letter written after the primary by Ex-Gov. Osborn to Truman H. Newberry. I read:

My idea is that the thing for you to do is to honestly confess that you broke the law and that you knew all about the campaign, but that you did not realize the enormity of your offense. In such a position you would be intrenched in honesty, I fully believe. And an indulgent people would forgive you and fight for you because of the past services they think you have given and what they have been told you are giving now. In addition, this action would make for your name an honorable place in the history of Michigan. Otherwise the future will curse you.

The plea can not be honestly made that you spent money in excess because you were fighting Ford, because you had begun your reckless campaign long before Ford was mentioned and had already transgressed the law. Nor can you plead you "did not know." That would prove you to be both an ass and a liar, which I choose to think you are not.

Senators, are you going to vote to seat Mr. Newberry in the face of what Ex-Gov. Osborn said to Mr. Newberry about that corrupt and scandalous primary?

Mr. Newberry has never denied the charges made in that letter by ex-Gov. Osborn. I have heard it whispered about that they might bring him, Mr. Newberry, in at the last moment and get him to make a statement. Well, whenever they do that, they are going to do it under circumstances when I can interrogate him and when other Members of this body can interrogate him. I am not going to submit to any agreement by which he could come in here in the last 30 minutes of the debate, read a prepared statement, and not be open to question by the Members of this body.

This case is going to be fought to a finish. I owe it to myself, I owe it to the State that honors me with a seat in this body, I owe it to the Nation whose institutions I love, and I owe it to those who fought and yet live and to those who died in defense of my country to do all in my power to keep this place free from the corrupting and corroding power of the dollar in politics.

I recall the Lorimer case. They waited until the last minute and had him to come in and sob and say that he hoped he would not be unseated; but Senators who thought more of their oath of office and more of their own honor as guardians of the integrity of the Senate and defenders of the people's rights voted to unseat him and he was unseated. Those who voted for him, all of them but seven, are gone; and I call upon Senators now to choose you this day whom you will serve—the god of mammon or the god of good government, the god of clean politics in America.

You may vote to seat this man; you may clothe him with power to sit here and kill the vote of Senators who stand here with clean credentials, without a taint on their titles. I do not know what your judgment will be; but, mark you, Senators, you are going to face these facts out in the States.

Thank God, there is a judgment bar where we can go with these terrible facts and submit them to the women and the men who constitute the electorate of America. If you vote to seat this man you are going to have to answer to an outraged and indignant people. So remember that when you vote to seat Mr. Newberry you may be voting to unseat yourselves. Choose you this day then what course you will pursue.

Let me remind you again before I close that they admit that they spent over $200,000. That amount of money would pay the salary of a Senator for more than a quarter of a century. That amount of money would pay the salary of all the Senators for one year from the States of New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana, Wisconsin, Illinois, Alabama, Georgia, California, Texas, Pennsylvania, and Iowa. Senators, are you ready to tolerate that? They admit the expenditure of a campaign fund that would pay the salary of one Senator in this body for more than four full terms, and that would pay the salaries of 26 Senators for one year. That is nearly one-third of the membership of this body.

Senators, Mr. Newberry went into the senatorial campaign knowing that it was going to cost a large amount of money. He went in knowing that it would cost him more than the salary would amount to for a full term in the Senate. He went in knowing that he was going to violate the law of his State and the law of the National Government. He went in intending to spend all the money deemed necessary to secure the nomination. He did secure the nomination by the extravagant and unlawful use of money.

Paul King, his manager, said he kept him informed as to what was going on in the campaign. Fred Smith, his confidential agent, said that he drew money on checks given by him out of the joint fund of Truman H. Newberry and John S. Newberry.

In the face of all this testimony and in spite of the criticisms made by prominent Republicans and newspapers in Michigan, Mr. Newberry's lawyers say in their closing statement of his case, "We have no apology to make; no shame for anything that we have done."

Senators, it is high time that the Senate should teach Mr. Newberry's attorneys and managers that their conception of what is a proper method of selecting a United States Senator can not in common decency and good morals be accepted by the United States Senate.

Mr. President, I remember that during the Republican convention at Chicago last June it was charged that an effort was being made to buy the Republican nomination for the Presidency, and I remember that the brave and able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], whose voice will be heard in this Chamber, thank God, in defense of the honor and integrity of this body, rose and reminded the convention of the days when the emperor-ship of Rome was put upon the auction block and sold to the highest bidder. He denounced the corrupt use of money in politics and called upon the delegates in convention assembled to spurn and frown upon the candidate who dared to make barter of the high office of President.

Senators, we are told to watch as well as pray, and that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

Mr. President, we know what happened to Rome. When money became the controlling power in her politics, she fell down among her beautiful hills and died. Lord Byron, in speaking of the woe that came to her, said:

Oh Rome! City of the soul!
The orphans of the heart must turn to thee,
Lone mother of dead empires, and control
In their shut breasts their petty misery.
What are our woes and sufferance? Come and see
The cypress, hear the owl, and plod your way
O'er steps of broken thrones and temples, ye!
Whose agonies are evils of a day—
A world is at our feet as fragile as our clay.
The Niobe of nations! There she stands
Childless and crownless, in her voiceless woe;
An empty urn within her wither'd hands,
Whose holy dust was scatter'd long ago.

Senators, will we not profit by the experience of Rome? God forbid that anyone shall ever point to a vote of mine and say, "He voted to permit the corrupt use of money to be employed in selecting Members of the United States Senate." Let us who are honored and trusted with the guardianship of the Senate's honor and integrity swear that this thing shall not be done. Let us for the sake of the good name of the Senate and for the good of our common country halt this thing at the threshold of the Senate and "break the jaws of the wicked and pluck the spoil out of his teeth."

Mr. President, why do they want seats in this body? Why, if they can control this Chamber they can legislate money into their pockets. Senators, have we not seen votes in this Chamber in the last 60 days that legislated money out of the Treasury back into the pockets of men with millions when 6,000,000 human beings in the country are unemployed, and 500,000 of them ex-soldiers, men who wore the uniform of their country? Do you wonder then why certain interests want seats in this body? God pity the Senate if this thing is consummated.

Senators, I call on you to stand firm and steadfast. Near the Grampian Hills in Scotland there is a lonely, rocky headland that overlooks the homes on the moors, and when, on the far-away battle line, there is any lagging amongst the soldiers the commander steps out in front and says, "Soldiers!" And when he gets their attention he looks toward Scotland and says, "Stand fast, Craig Alachie!" When they were on the battle plains of France—God bless them, as brave soldiers as ever battled—the cry, "Stand fast, Craig Alachie!" rang down the lines as the Scotch soldiers hurled implements of destruction into the ranks of the German Army.

Mr. President, to-day, as an humble Member of this body, I call upon Senators to stand fast. This historic tribunal and guardian of the people's rights is being assailed. They are storming one of the legislative citadels of the Nation. They are seeking to make barter of the seats in this honored body. Stand fast, Senators! If the time shall ever come when seats in this body are for sale as they are upon the stock exchanges of the country, God pity us. There is nothing that will do more to foster bolshevism, socialism, and anarchy than for the impression to prevail that seats in the United States Senate are bought and sold.

If the time ever comes, whether Democrats or Republicans have a majority in this body, when the people believe their seats are bought and sold, then you may well tremble for the safety of any country.

The able and eloquent Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] told in beautiful fashion how the various States used to open the wardrobe of their civic households, and as an expression of their confidence, esteem, and love took out the senatorial toga and placed it with their blessings upon the shoulders of a worthy son, and in withering contrast with that picture he showed how Mr. Newberry had built a stairway with gold dollars leading up into the wardrobe in Michigan and that in an evil hour he purchased with money the senatorial toga, which, being secured under those conditions, had become a dirty and filthy rag.

O Mr. President, I recall the time when Cullom, of Illinois; Teller, of Colorado; and Daniel W. Voorhees, of Indiana, Republicans and Democrats, stood in their places in this Chamber, having obtained their nominations and elections without money and without price. From some of those States a poor man can not come to the Senate now.

Has the Senate entered upon a state of degeneracy; has decay commenced its terrible work upon this historic body?

Are virtues which warmed the hearts of the statesmen of other days become corrupt and dead in us? I can not believe it. It was Anacharsis, the Greek historian, I believe, who said that when Solon had completed his laws for the Athenians, he decided to leave Athens for a period of 10 years, and at the expiration of that time to return to see how they had progressed under his laws. The 10 years passed and great Solon returned. Processions came out to do him honor. He stood upon the highest elevation overlooking the city and viewed the processions as they passed.

The first procession was that of old men with bowed backs and feeble step. The banner above their heads bore the inscription, "We have protected the State." "Yes," said Solon, "those were glorious days for Athens, but they are gone."

Another procession came into view, men in middle life, with firm and steady tread, and the banner above their heads bore the inscription, "We protect the State." "Yes," said Solon, "but what will become of dear old Athens when you are no longer her defenders?" Hark, a shriller note is borne on the morning air. The vigorous, elastic step of young manhood, now glorying in its might, passed in review. The banner above their heads bore the inscription, "We will protect the State." "Praised be the gods," shouted Solon, "the State is safe."

Mr. President, Washington, the father of our country, warned us against the baneful influence of money in politics. He admonished us to always be on guard against it. Aye, he appealed to us to protect and safeguard the free institutions of America against its dangerous, corrupting, and deadening influence. Senators, can we vote to seat Truman H. Newberry as a Member of the United States Senate and be true to ourselves, true to our oaths, and true to our country?

Where are they who made up the list of United States Senators since under God this honored institution came into being? Gone! Nearly all of them are gone.

Time was when they guarded with intrepid vigilance the good name, the honor, and integrity of the Senate and stood a mighty bulwark in defense of the rights and liberties of the people.

Mr. President, if Washington could return to earth and they could pass in procession before him, nearly all of them would march with heads erect and light upon their faces as they carried an honored banner bearing the inscription, "We protected the honor and integrity of the Senate and safeguarded the rights and liberties of the American people." But, Senators, how would it be with us now honored with places in this body if Washington should ask us to provide a banner and march in procession before him? Could we, in the face of the evidence in the Newberry case and in all good conscience after voting to seat Mr. Newberry as a Member of the Senate of the United States, carry a banner bearing the inscription, "We protect the honor and integrity of the Senate and safeguard the rights and liberties of the American people"? God grant that we will say just that by our votes in the Newberry case.

TAX REVISION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the conference report. Those in favor of agreeing to the report will say "aye."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, what is the motion which is being put so fast?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SWANSON. Let us have a quorum.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not think it necessary for us to proceed quite so fast.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated the pending question, which is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], who is at this time in charge of the report, if he proposes to make any statement with reference to the action of the conference?

Mr. McCUMBER. I assume that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] will return to the Chamber in a moment. He just had to step out of the Chamber and will be back immediately. The Senator from North Carolina may proceed, and when the Senator from Pennsylvania returns he can make his statement as the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would prefer not to go on until the Senator from Pennsylvania or some one representing the majority membership of the conference makes a statement. I desire to inquire meanwhile if the report of the conferees has been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report has been printed in the RECORD. The Chair does not know that it has been read to the Senate. It has been printed in the RECORD and is on the desks of Senators.

AMENDMENT OF GONZAGA COLLEGE CHARTER.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Secretary's desk. Is that in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not really in order as long as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] holds the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield the floor.

Mr. CALDER. The bill merely amends the corporation charter of Gonzaga College of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Secretary will report.

Mr. SMOOT. If it leads to any discussion, I shall have to object.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let the bill be read.

The bill (H. R. 7428) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the city of Washington and District of Columbia," was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the city of Washington and District of Columbia," approved May 4, 1858, is amended to read as follows:

"That Burcard Villiger, Charles H. Stonestreet, Daniel Lynch, Edward X. Hand, and Charles Jenkins, and their successors, be, and they are hereby, made a body politic and corporate forever, by the name of the president and directors of Gonzaga College, for purposes of charity, religion, and education; and by that name may sue, and be sued, prosecute and defend; may have and use a common seal, and the same alter and renew at pleasure; may adopt rules, regulations, and by-laws not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, for properly conducting the affairs of said corporation; may take, receive, purchase, and hold estate, real, personal, and mixed necessary for occupation and use by said Gonzaga College in carrying on in a comfortable and convenient manner its educational, religious, and charitable work, and may manage and dispose of the same at pleasure, and apply the same, or the proceeds of the sales thereof, to the uses and purposes of the said corporation, according to the rules and regulations which now are, or may hereafter be, established."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York for the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Senator whether there is not a law providing for the incorporation of associations in the District?

Mr. CALDER. I will state that this college was incorporated in 1858 and, of course, it has been proceeding under its incorporation. The bill simply changes the limitation permitting it to own and control only $200,000 worth of property, so that it may exceed that limit. When it bought its property in the District of Columbia land was cheap and the school buildings were small. Last year it erected a building at a cost of several hundred thousand dollars. It is an organization which has existed for 100 years and which celebrated its centenary last week. The bill merely seeks to amend the present charter so that it may own more than $200,000 worth of property.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does it exempt that property from taxation?

Mr. CALDER. All colleges are exempt from taxation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is exempt now?

Mr. CALDER. It is exempt now.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the bill places no limitation on the property which they can now own. The old limitation was $200,000. They have now a million dollars worth of property and the bill gives them an unlimited power to hold property.

Mr. CALDER. The present property is not taxed at all. In transactions involving the borrowing of money on their property there always appears in their charter the statement that they can own only $200,000 worth of property, while as a matter of fact they actually own more than a million dollars worth of property.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from New York or the Senator from Minnesota, in view of the statement just made by the Senator from Minnesota, whether, if it should acquire holdings, the same would be exempt from taxation if its property were not used for educational purposes? If that were true, then we ought not to grant the right to hold unlimited quantities of property. I think colleges ought to be exempt from taxation as to the property which is absolutely necessary for educational purposes, but if they should engage in the real estate business I doubt if that principle should apply.

Mr. CALDER. As I understand it, the enactment of this measure simply puts them under the same conditions they would be under if they had incorporated under the general law. I can assure the Senator of that.

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether they could not avail themselves of the general law and amend their charter without coming to Congress?

Mr. CALDER. They contend that they can not, because they were incorporated under a specific law.

Mr. KING. If the general law is properly drawn it certainly would apply to corporations that have specific charters and would permit them by going to the general law to avail themselves of its provisions for amendment. It seems to me they could amend by filing under the general law.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the bill simply amends the present law. The present charter of the college puts a limitation upon the amount of property it can own or the amount of money it can invest. The bill will permit it to conform to the general law and hold property the same as any other college.

Mr. CALDER. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 22, 1921.

REPORT OF THE NATIONAL COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS (S. DOC. NO. 79).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on the Library and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the ninth report of the National Commission of Fine Arts for the period from July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1921.

The report deals with the progress made during the past 20 years in realizing the comprehensive plan for the entire District of Columbia reported to the Senate, as a result of extensive studies of the plans of capital cities in Europe. This plan was prepared as a public service by men of the highest standing in the professions of architecture, sculpture, and landscape architecture. Professedly it was based upon the L'Enfant plan of 1792 for the Federal city in the District of Columbia, designed under the personal supervision of President Washington; and, indeed, was largely an extension of that plan to cover the entire District. The L'Enfant plan was the first and most comprehensive design for a national capital ever adopted. The plan of 1901 reasserted the authority of the original plan; extended it to meet the needs of the Nation after a century of growth in power, wealth, and dignity; and marked the path for future development. During the past two decades the essential features of the plan have been established, so that the work of the future will be largely a filling in of outlines. It is a source of satisfaction that so much has been done to make the city of Washington conspicuous among national capitals in respect of dignity, orderliness, convenience, and beauty. All that has been done increases the importance of adhering to a plan that during nearly a century and a quarter has abundantly justified the foresight and the vision of the founders of the Republic.

The report of the Commission of Fine Arts deals also with the plans made under the direction of the Secretary of War for the cemeteries in Europe where rest the bodies of American men and women who gave their lives in the World War. By reason of their location on the field of battle the French cemeteries have a double claim to our reverent consideration—they mark both the places of burial of our heroic dead, and also the very field on which their sacrifice was made. These cemeteries are indeed fields of honor. They represent in the highest and most sacred way the participation of this Nation in the Great War. They should be treated in a manner befitting their representative character.

Further, the report discloses the work of the commission in its many details. During the 11 years since Congress created that body its helpfulness has constantly increased. In many fields it has established and maintained standards of taste; and in furthering and safe guarding the plan of Washington it is especially useful.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 22, 1921.

INVESTIGATION OF TREATMENT OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the other day the Senate passed a resolution authorizing the committee appointed to investigate charges as to executions of members of the Expeditionary Forces abroad contrary to law to employ a stenographer and conduct hearings, and so forth. The auditor in the financial clerk's office informs me that the language of the resolution is not broad enough to include the employment of a clerk for the committee. I therefore ask that the resolution be amended by inserting a provision which I will send to the desk and ask to have read, and then I shall ask that the resolution may be referred again to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The READING CLERK. In the original resolution, on page 1, line 9, after the word "committee," insert the following: "and to employ such clerical assistance as in the judgment of the committee may be necessary."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that it may be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the original resolution was agreed to will be considered as having been reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The resolution, with the amendment, will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

IMMIGRANTS AT ELLIS ISLAND.

Mr. McCORMICK. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of Labor relative to conditions of immigration at Ellis Island, N. Y., and the accompanying letters.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, November 21, 1921.

Hon. MEDILL McCORMICK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your inquiry concerning conditions of immigration at Ellis Island, I have taken up this matter with the Commissioner General of Immigration and wish to submit the following:

In the first place, the commissioner general assures me that the charges concerning the treatment of immigrants at Ellis Island, and particularly those which have appeared recently in syndicated articles, are so grossly exaggerated as to be misleading and are in fact essentially false from beginning to end. The particular series of newspaper articles which have come to the department's attention and which seem to have been the basis of much of the criticism alluded to concern Ellis Island only in part. They purport to be the experiences of a reporter traveling in the guise of an immigrant from Ireland aboard the steamship, at quarantine, and while aboard the ship in New York Harbor waiting to be transferred to Ellis Island. It seems evident that the articles were aimed specifically at Ellis Island, for throughout the story of the ocean voyage and while the ship was in New York Harbor before the passengers were landed at the island the writer seems to lay particular stress on the conversation covering the probable experiences at that station. The articles seem to be largely about Ellis Island, whereas the actual experiences of the writer at the island formed only a minor part of the series.

A brief review of immigration during the past two years is necessary to an understanding of the situation at Ellis Island. The immigration station and hospital buildings at the island have a floor space of about 14 acres. This property was turned over to the Navy during the war and the immigration force was badly disorganized owing to the practical cessation of movement from Europe during the war period. The force had not been fully organized when, during the fiscal year 1921, European immigration was resumed on a large scale. As the immigration increased, hurried efforts were evidently made to increase the force at the island in order to meet it, with the result that a great many inexperienced persons were called to the service in place of trained men who had gone into other occupations during the war.

When the present administration took charge there were about 780 employees at that station, many of whom, as already stated, were inexperienced. At the same time the character of immigrants who applied at that station for admission was such that they were handled only with great difficulty. Prior to the war it was necessary to detain only comparatively few of the large numbers who passed through that station for the reason that practically all of them were supplied with railway tickets to destination and the great majority had sufficient money for their subsistence while en route. Immigration which came after the war, however, was in the main destitute. It was impossible for many of them to obtain through transportation to destination, and thousands upon thousands had to be held at Ellis Island pending the receipt of transportation money from friends or relatives, sometimes in distant parts of the country.

As has been frequently stated, Ellis Island is essentially a station and not a hotel. There are sleeping accommodations there for approximately 1,800 people, but admittedly these accommodations are not suitable for the long detention of great numbers of arriving immigrants. Immediately following the advent of the present administration steps were taken to correct conditions at the island so far as was possible, and at the same time it was necessary to greatly reduce the force, with the result that on July 1, 1921, only about 520 persons were employed there. The enactment of the 3 per cent limit law, particularly during June, July, August, and September, also made necessary the long detention of a large number of aliens, and as a result certain hardships were absolutely unavoidable.

Early in the present fiscal year, however, a committee of the department and bureau was assigned to Ellis Island to make a detailed study of the whole situation. This committee was engaged there for several weeks, with the result that many changes, both in personnel and in the general method of handling immigrants, were made, which changes have already resulted in a very considerable improvement. In the few cases where it was possible to prove dishonesty, employees, some occupying positions of trust, were separated from the service, and appropriate action was taken in the case of employees who were shown to be rough or discourteous with the immigrants. Moreover, Mr. Robert E. Tod was appointed commissioner at Ellis Island and took charge on October 22. This immediately resulted in a noticeable improvement in the morale of the force, and as Mr. Tod is devoting his entire time and great organizing ability to the task a very general and gratifying improvement has been noted along every line.

Radical changes were also made in the personnel of the station at Boston, and the assistant commissioner at Montreal. Mr. Irving F. Wixon, was assigned there as acting commissioner. Mr. Wixon, aided by members of the Departmental and Bureau Committee, above referred to, has undertaken as complete a reorganization of the Boston station as is possible under the circumstances, and notable improvements have already been made. At the latter station several employees were permanently separated from the service and some transfers made.

Early in the fiscal year the commissioner general appointed an advisory committee consisting of Mr. Fred C. Croxton, director of the Columbus Council of Social Agencies, of Columbus, Ohio; Mrs. Nathaniel Thayer, director of the division of immigration and Americanization of the department of education of Massachusetts, Boston; Miss Julia Lathrop, formerly Chief of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor; and Mr. W. W. Sibray, inspector in charge of the United States Immigration Service at Pittsburgh. This was subsequently increased by the addition of Dr. Charles P. Neill, of the National Catholic Service School, of Washington, and Miss Loula Lasker, of New York City. This disinterested committee has undertaken a thorough study of welfare work among immigrants arriving at the various ports as well as among those en route to destination. It is anticipated that this committee will make valuable recommendations as to what is necessary to insure that aliens arriving at United States ports shall have every consideration compatible with careful enforcement of the law.

Criticism of the treatment accorded immigrants arriving at United States ports is no new thing. It has always prevailed, even in the days when there was no immigration law to interfere with the immediate admission of all who came and Castle Garden instead of Ellis Island was the principal gateway of the New World. The first Federal immigration law, enacted in 1882, provided only for the exclusion of convicts, lunatics, idiots, and persons likely to become public charges, but since that time there has been an ever-growing demand that every class and kind of physical, mental, and moral defectives and delinquents must be prevented from entering the United States, until now there are some 30 more or less distinct tests which the law directs shall be applied to every immigrant who applies for admission. In addition to this, the per cent limit act of May 19, 1921, provides that not more than a specified number of aliens may be admitted in any month of the year.

Obviously such drastic laws require that immigrants must be carefully inspected before they can be admitted, and while a large majority are immediately allowed to enter the country large numbers are necessarily detained until their cases can be finally passed upon. Of course, the detention at immigration stations of those whose right to admission under the law is in doubt is in itself something of a hardship, and this fact is at the bottom of practically all the criticism that is leveled at the Immigration Service. The detained aliens themselves rarely complain of ill treatment, for the simple reason that they are well treated. The complaints, as a matter of fact, almost invariably come from friends or relatives, who, individually or through attorneys, organizations, or others, seek to have the detained aliens admitted, often with little regard for the law in the case.

Failure or even delay in attaining the desired end not unnaturally engenders resentment, and this resentment not infrequently leads to wholly unwarranted criticism of conditions at places of detention, and unjust accusations of discourtesy, ill treatment, or even cruelty against officers and employees of the service who must necessarily perform their duties, however disagreeable such duties may be. The Bureau of Immigration is constantly investigating criticisms and reports of this nature, and except in rare instances finds they have little or no foundation in fact. However, when it is discovered that complaints are based on truth, measures, and sometimes drastic measures, are taken to prevent a repetition of the offense.

Ordinarily more than three-fourths of all the immigrants who come to the United States by sea enter at the port of New York, and with the exception of cabin passengers, the great majority of whom are admitted direct from ships, practically all who come pass through the station at Ellis Island, and naturally much of the criticism that arises concerns that station. Prior to the World War the daily admissions at the island not infrequently numbered 5,000, and on occasions 6,000 were handled there. But in those days there was no literacy test, no passport regulations, or per cent limit requirement, and it may be presumed that the medical and other inspections were less rigid than at present. In any event, the great majority of arriving aliens prior to the war passed through the station immediately and went on to their destination. Practically all who came held railway tickets to their destination in the United States, and as a rule they were supplied with sufficient money to provide for their wants while en route there.

For reasons that are easily understandable less favorable conditions have prevailed since the war. The way of the emigrants in Europe has been hard. They have been compelled, in several countries at least, to spend much time in waiting for passport visas, undergoing medical examination and observation, and also until recently in securing ocean transportation. As a result of such delays, combined with the high cost of every necessity of travel, a considerable proportion of the immigrants have been practically destitute on arrival at the island. This necessarily resulted in an abnormally large number being detained there, sometimes for considerable periods of time.

As said before, Ellis Island is essentially a station and not a hotel. There are sleeping accommodations, in emergencies, for as high as 2,000. The dormitory system prevails, the beds being of the closely woven wire type. For reasons which need not be stated, mattresses are not provided, but there is always an ample supply of blankets, which are used as substitutes. The equipment is sanitary in every respect, and every dormitory has fairly adequate wash rooms and toilet facilities. These rooms are thoroughly cleaned every day and fumigated when necessary, and, except in cases where a detained alien occupies the same bed more than once, the blankets are sterilized daily. Several smaller and more favorably located rooms, some of which are equipped with single beds, are provided for cabin passengers. The station, however, lacks sleeping accommodations of a better class for women with young children, aged persons, and aliens of the nonimmigrant type who occasionally must be detained, and Congress has been asked to make an emergency appropriation to meet this need.

The immigrants' dining room at the island is large and well lighted, has a tile floor and white tile walls, simple but adequate equipment, and is kept scrupulously clean. The food served is ample in quantity, excellent in quality, and is prepared by well-qualified cooks in a kitchen which compares favorably with that of any large institution.

The hospitals at Ellis Island are operated by the United States Public Health Service and are of the usual high standard of that service. Other comment regarding them is unnecessary.

It should be stated in this connection that Ellis Island is thoroughly inadequate for the handling of large numbers of aliens, especially when it is necessary to detain them for any length of time. There is little space on any one of the three islands which is not entirely covered by buildings. This means, of course, that the out-of-door recreation facilities are limited. There is ample space for handling large numbers of aliens, but with the exception of the hospitals these buildings are poorly arranged for the purpose. They have apparently been built piecemeal, with the result that they are for the most part inconvenient and unsuitable for detention purposes. The most attractive portions of the immigration station proper are devoted to the handling of those who pass through on primary inspection and therefore are, as a rule, not detained at the island even overnight. On the other hand, the quarters devoted to the detention of aliens, including the day rooms and dormitories, are less attractive. Efforts are being made to correct this situation so far as possible, but a considerable amount of money would be necessary in order to bring about the improvements desired, and this is not available. Some indication of what is believed to be actually needed in order to put the station in first-class condition may be shown by the fact that we have recommended an appropriation of nearly $1,000,000 to be spent on improvements.

It must be assumed that when Congress enacted immigration laws it did so in the conviction that such laws were necessary to the welfare of the Nation, and it is a perfectly obvious fact that the people of the country, with comparatively few exceptions, demand that such laws shall be faithfully executed. Indeed, there has been and is a growing demand for an increasingly strict administration of the laws, and the service fully realizes that whenever it attempts to comply with this demand a storm of censure invariably follows. A single example in this regard may be cited. It has long been complained that the medical inspection of arriving immigrants is not sufficiently thorough, but when great numbers were arriving daily an intensive inspection was not feasible with the limited number of medical officers available. Of late, however, the reduced immigration has made it possible to thoroughly examine a considerable proportion of those arriving. Results have already more than justified the effort, but, strangely enough, this departure has already been characterized as an additional horror of Ellis Island. Stripping immigrants for the purpose of detecting defects or discovering disease-carrying lice appears to be regarded as an indignity by some critics, but in one case it resulted in disclosing leprosy, and in numerous other instances less terrible but nevertheless dangerous diseases.

Humane treatment must and will be given aliens seeking admission to the United States, but it is the firm belief of the bureau and department that efforts to detect undesirables of all classes, physical, mental, and moral, ought to be increased rather than diminished. This, however, can not be accomplished without adding to the alleged hardships which immigrants now undergo, and in view of the prevailing, although unwarranted, criticism to which the service is now being subjected, the bureau and department naturally hesitate to undertake a more adequate enforcement of the law.

The per centum limit law has admittedly resulted in hardship to many immigrants and bitter disappointment to their relatives and friends already in the United States. Moreover, it has seriously interfered with certain business and other interests who desire an ample supply of cheap labor, and it is well known that in the days of free immigration an alien was usually given preference in the matter of employment, although Americans were unemployed. Even now, when so large a number of our people are out of work, it is noticeable that a very large proportion of the aliens who are admitted find work almost immediately. Obviously this means that many Americans, and even ex-service men, are either displaced or are unable to find work. It should be considered that Congress enacted this law as the substitute for the total suspension of immigration and that a very radical restriction of the promised influx from Europe is the deliberately adopted policy of the Government.

It is easy to understand why the interests just referred to object to the law, and it is not strange that every possible effort to discredit it should be made, but it is most difficult to comprehend why Americans and American newspapers accept as the fact every derogatory criticism that is hurled at the Immigration Service, without making the slightest effort to ascertain whether the accusations are true or false, thus making it extremely difficult to enforce laws which at this time clearly are necessary to the welfare of the Nation.

While it is in my hands I assure you that no stone will be left unturned to make the Immigration Service of this country as nearly ideal as it is possible to make it. As long as I am Secretary of Labor I shall endeavor to extend to every immigrant arriving at our gates and admissible a cordial welcome to the country.

Conditions have vastly improved since we took office. There has been especially a marked improvement during the past few weeks, as is evidenced from letters, dated November 5 and 12, from Mr. Howard V. Yergin, a lecturer at Columbia University, copies of which I am inclosing herewith. The first was written by Mr. Yergin before he had had first-hand information as to present conditions at Ellis Island, and shows that he also was of the opinion that conditions were intolerable, as unfortunately has been the impression throughout the country. The latter letter, written after this gentleman had visited the island and was acquainted with the actual conditions, indicates how completely he had a change of heart.

Sincerely, yours,

JAMES J. DAVIS,
Secretary of Labor.

THE AMERICAN PARISH,
New York City, November 5, 1921.

MR. ROBERT E. TOD,
Commissioner of Immigration,
Ellis Island, New York City.

DEAR SIR: For the past four years, in addition to my direct work with the immigrants under the Presbyterian Church, I have lectured at Teachers College of Columbia University on various phases of the immigrant problem. This year, under the direction of the New York State Department of Education, I am lecturing in extension courses in Elmira and Binghamton, upon immigrant backgrounds and conditions.

I have visited Ellis Island many times, both alone and with my classes from Columbia. Our last visit was a week ago Friday. Conditions seem to be so intolerable there, as I observed and heard of them from immigrants who have passed through the island, that I have been calling attention to these conditions in various public speeches, in my classes, and elsewhere. Last night before a committee of the Kiwanis Club in Binghamton I informally spoke of the bad conditions at the island, due to various causes; as result I am asked to return in two weeks and address the whole Kiwanis Club and also the Rotary Club of that city and probably of Elmira.

It is easy to criticize and find fault; it is still easier to misrepresent, unintentionally. Because I believe that the blame for conditions at the island rests more largely with the United States Government, particularly Congress, than with the failures of past commissioners, I feel that if men of the type of Rotary and Kiwanis can be interested in the problems some results may be obtained. I am anxious to speak fairly and authoritatively. Would it therefore be possible for you to grant me a few moments of your very valuable time during the week of November 7 (except on Monday and Wednesday mornings and Thursday afternoons, when I have fixed engagements at the university) in order that I may learn just how far and in what way I and others like me and such groups as Kiwanis and Rotary, can be of any service to you in your attempt to better the treatment accorded the immigrant at Ellis Island?

Pardon the lengthy prelude to my request, but I do not like to intrude on a busy man's time without justifying myself in so doing.

Very truly, yours,

HOWARD V. YERGIN.

THE AMERICAN PARISH,
New York City, November 12, 1921.

Commissioner ROBERT E. TOD,
Ellis Island, New York City.

MY DEAR COMMISSIONER TOD: I wish to thank you most sincerely for your courtesy in giving to me so much of your own time at Ellis Island on Thursday morning, and also for the time and interest which Mr. Sherman gave in showing me about the island and explaining the situation so clearly. I did not return to see you after the trip through the island, because of the necessity of having lunch and leaving on the next boat in order to keep an engagement in New York.

I have gained an entirely new viewpoint toward the enormous problems you have to face. I have learned, as I suspected I might, that some of the problems that we laymen on the outside would settle so easily and rapidly are so far-reaching in their complications that any solution can be arrived at only through long processes of patient work and negotiations—I am thinking in especial of the project of giving to our Consular Service abroad the power of examination for entry before the emigrant leaves his home country.

There seemed to be a new spirit on the island, a totally different one from that which I felt on my last visit with a class from Columbia only three weeks ago. In a few cases I observed what might appear roughness and unnecessary harshness, but in many others I noticed genuine courtesy toward the immigrants. You have accomplished much, apparently, in a very short time in the way of improving morale and arousing a right spirit among the workers.

I refrain from offering suggestions, for I have come back greatly heartened because of my conversation with you, and of what I saw and heard on the island. You must know whatever difficulties there are much better than I, and therefore know the remedy, if there is one, better than I.

I rejoice that I can carry a message of hope to the audiences I address. I wish that I might do more to aid you in the gigantic task ahead of you.

With every wish and prayer for your success in handling aright the problems that face you, I am Very sincerely, yours,

HOWARD V. YERGIN.

ADDITIONAL PAGES FOR SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. CALDER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 175), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to employ five additional pages for the Senate Chamber at $3 per day each from the 1st day of December, 1921, to the end of the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolutions were severally read twice by title and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 8346. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the board of supervisors of Whiteside County, Ill., to construct a bridge across Rock River; to the Committee on Commerce.

H. J. Res. 210. Joint resolution for the appointment of one member of the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H. J. Res. 225. Joint resolution authorizing payment of the salaries of officers and employees of Congress for November, 1921, on the 23d day of said month; to the Committee on Appropriations.

TAX REVISION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report on the revenue bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I have no speech to make on the conference report. Does the representative of the minority desire to speak on the measure?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator does not desire to make any statement, I do.

Mr. PENROSE. I have a statement here that I would be very glad to have the Secretary read or to have printed in the Record without reading.

Mr. SIMMONS. Just as the Senator wishes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let us have it read.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask for the reading of the statement which I send to the desk.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

form of the House bill and modified its substance in many im-

The revenue bill as it passed the Senate entirely changed the pertinent provisions. The Senate amendments number 833. Of these, the conference committee recommend that the Senate recede in the case of 7 amendments, that the House recede in the case of 760 amendments, and that the House recede with amendments in 66 cases.

Income-tax rates: On the vital question of income-tax rates an adjustment in the nature of a compromise is recommended. The manager on the part of the House accepted (under instructions) the Senate schedule of surtax rates applicable to individuals. The Senate conferees, in return, accepted the House rate of 12½ per cent applicable to corporations. This reduction of 2½ per cent from the proposed Senate rate on corporations will reduce the tax burden on business—and correspondingly reduce the revenue in the first instance—by $110,000,000 a year. Fortunately, the reduction is covered or justified by further economies in the expenditures for the current fiscal year recently arranged for and announced by President Harding in his letter of November 1, 1921, and to which I shall refer later. The lower rate will be particularly reassuring to public utility companies and thousands of other corporations which are now earning only 3 or 4 per cent, or less, on the capital invested. And the 12½ per cent rate is a fair equivalent, or more than an equal equivalent, for the taxes paid by individuals and in effect by partnerships. More than 99 per cent of those who pay the individual as distinguished from the corporation tax will pay less than 12½ per cent on their net income under the bill as recommended, whereas the stockholders of corporations will pay 12½ per cent through the corporation and in addition surtaxes on that part of the corporation's profit which is distributed.

The recommendations regarding the corporation rate must be considered in connection with other recommendations affecting corporations. The Senate proposal to repeal or withdraw the specific exemption of $2,000 in the case of corporations having net incomes in excess of $25,000 was accepted by the House conferees. And, as part of the same general compromise, the Senate conferees agreed to that provision of the House bill which debars or excludes corporations from the benefits of a reduced rate on capital gains. The Senate plan in effect taxed capital gains at 40 per cent of the rates applicable to ordinary or other income. This would have meant in the case of individuals a maximum tax on capital gains of over 23 per cent—that is, 40 per cent of the maximum individual tax of 58 per cent. A tax of 23 per cent is high enough to freeze up or prevent capital transactions of the kind which, for the sake of the revenue, it is desired to encourage. But in the case of corporations the Senate method would have taxed capital gains at only 5 per cent—that is, 40 per cent of the corporation tax of 12½ per cent. This discrimination or difference between the individual and corporation taxes on capital gains impressed the conferees as extreme; and accordingly—in consideration of the lower rate of 12½ per cent on ordinary corporation income—it is recommended that the privilege of paying a reduced rate on capital gains be confined, as in the House bill, to individuals; and that individuals electing to utilize this provision be permitted to include in capital gains profits derived from the sale of stock in corporations. On the other hand, the capital-gain provisions as agreed to in conference depart from the House plan in allowing full and complete deduction for capital losses. Finally, the conference plan will, if adopted, greatly simplify the administration of this new and intricate provision of the income tax.

Estate tax: On two important amendments to the estate-tax title the managers on the part of the Senate were finally compelled to yield to the persuasive arguments and persistent demands of the House conferees. In Senate amendment No. 582 the estate-tax rates were increased by four new brackets, raising the present maximum rate of 25 per cent to 50 per cent. These increased rates, it was shown, could not bring in any additional revenue before the fiscal year 1924, and they would, if adopted, so stimulate the distribution or partition of estates before death and so break the values of the assets found in the larger estates, when sold in sufficient quantity to pay these heavy taxes, as actually to reduce the collections. Moreover, it developed upon examination that the State inheritance taxes in some Commonwealths now exceed 25 per cent, and that double or multiple taxation under State inheritance taxes is rapidly increasing. The Senate conferees therefore agreed to recommend the retention of the rates as found in existing law.

A similar attitude was taken toward the proposed graduated tax on gifts. It would add in effect an entirely new tax to the present unduly extended system of Federal taxes. Moreover, gifts in contemplation of death are taxed under existing law, and in section 202(a) (2) of the proposed new revenue act both the House and Senate have approved a new provision by which in the case of property acquired by gift the basis for computing gain or loss shall be the same as that which the property would have in the hands of the donor or the last preceding owner by whom it was not acquired by gift. This new provision will, it is believed, go far to prevent evasion of the income tax through the device of gifts inter vivos. In view of its incorporation in the law it was deemed unwise to experiment with more extreme measures and to penalize by the imposition of a new and difficult tax that distribution of fortunes, particularly the so-called "swollen fortunes," which advocates of heavy inheritance or estate taxation usually assert to be the chief aim and purpose of estate or inheritance taxation.

Taxes on alcoholic beverages: The House bill made only slight changes in the existing taxes upon alcoholic beverages, but the Senate amendments contain a number of new administrative provisions and new taxes of 60 cents per wine gallon on intoxicating malt liquors, $1.20 per wine gallon upon all vinous liquors, and $6.40 per proof gallon upon all distilled spirits except alcohol. It appeared upon examination that the Senate provisions would not only impose a heavy new tax upon whisky withdrawn for medicinal purposes but that they would discriminate in favor of alcohol and against whisky or wine in a number of uses both legitimate and illegitimate. For these and allied reasons the simpler provisions of the House bill are recommended.

Other amendments: Other amendments on which it is recommended that the Senate recede or accept modifications adopting substantially the provisions of the House bill are found in provisions (1) repealing the nuisance tax on cosmetics and toilet articles; (2) ignoring gain or loss in trades or exchanges when property held for investment is exchanged for property of a like kind or use; (3) exempting the income of nonresident aliens or foreign corporations which consists exclusively of earnings derived from the operation of ships documented under the laws of a country which grants equivalent exemption to United States citizens and corporations; (4) exempting for a period of five years dividends and interest not in excess of $300 received from domestic building and loan associations operated exclusively for the purpose of making loans to members; and (5) recognizing bona fide amortization claims not only if made at the time of filing returns for 1918 and 1919 but if filed in connection with the returns for the taxable years 1920 and 1921.

In a far larger number of even more important provisions the managers on the part of the House accepted the Senate amendments. Thus the Senate amendments relating to foreign traders and foreign-trade corporations; dividends and distributions made from profits accumulated or increase in value accrued prior to March 1, 1913; evasions of tax through stock dividends; gain derived or loss sustained in exchanges of property for property, particularly exchanges connected with reorganizations; the net loss allowance; the income of marital communities; the deduction for interest paid on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry Victory 3½ notes; the deductions for depreciation and for loss arising from destruction or damage in the case of property acquired prior to March 1, 1913; the credit or deduction for dividends in the case of foreign corporations which derive less than 50 per cent of their gross income from sources within the United States; reports by corporations of the portion of their earnings or profits distributed as dividends; the period of time during which taxpayers may file claims for refund or bring suit for the recovery of taxes illegally or erroneously collected; the payment of interest on claims for refund or credit allowed to the taxpayer; and the taxation of citizens and domestic corporations whose principal business is conducted in the Philippine Islands or Porto Rico. These represent only a few of the important Senate amendments upon which the House conferees have receded; and it will be found upon examination that among this large number of changes made by the Senate in which the House has acquiesced the provisions are about equally divided between those which protect the taxpayer against harsh or unjust applications of the law and those which protect the Treasury against practices or devices which unfairly reduce the revenue.

Revenue and expenditure: The revenue act of 1921 is properly denominated "An act to reduce taxation." The act as agreed to in conference will produce, it is estimated, $728,900,000 less than the present law would produce for the first fiscal year during which it is in full operation, and thereafter—when collections from the excess-profits tax wholly cease—the annual reduction of the tax burden will be even greater.

The net change effected by the conference recommendations, however, is not great. The act as passed by the Senate would produce, it is estimated, $3,242,730,000 in the fiscal year 1922 and $2,717,280,000 in the fiscal year 1923. As agreed to in conference it will, if adopted, yield $3,216,100,000 in the fiscal year 1922 and $2,611,100,000 in the fiscal year 1923. The net reduction caused by changes made in conference, therefore, is only $26,630,000 for the fiscal year 1922 and $106,180,000 for the fiscal year 1923.

These reductions are entirely consistent with a prudent and conservative financial program for the future. When the new revenue bill was first presented to the Senate the estimates of expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, made it necessary to raise from internal taxes $3,272,000,000. Since that time, however, the estimates of expenditures have been decreased by one important item and increased by another. The decrease arises in connection with the special railroad expenditures in settlement of claims arising under Federal control. President Harding has recently announced that it will be possible to meet special railroad expenditures in an amount of $94,000,000, not hitherto counted upon, from the proceeds of the sale of equipment notes and other railroad obligations held by the Government. On the other hand, the good roads bill recently approved provides additional appropriation of $90,000,000, of which about $80,000,000 will be available during this fiscal year, but of which, however, only about $20,000,000, it is estimated, will be expended during this fiscal year. The budget of expenditures for the fiscal year 1922, therefore, is reduced by $94,000,000 and increased by $20,000,000, a net reduction of $74,000,000. Taking into account this reduction of $74,000,000, it becomes necessary to raise, in round figures, only $3,200,000,000 by internal taxes during the fiscal year 1922. As already stated, the revenue bill agreed to in conference will yield during the current fiscal year, if adopted, $3,216,100,000, or approximately $16,000,000 in excess of the estimated requirements.

It is not possible at this time to make an accurate forecast of the expenditures for the fiscal year 1923, but it is as certain as forecasts of this kind can be made that the special railroad expenditures during the fiscal year 1923 will be very largely reduced; and that other material economies or reductions will be effected not only by the Bureau of the Budget but as a result of the disarmament conference now in session. Taking into account these reductions, the probable increase in the customs collections, and the gradual emergence of the country from the depression from which we are now suffering, I have no doubt that the new revenue bill will supply for the fiscal year 1923 the full amount that must under the budget be derived from internal taxes.

It need not be feared that we shall fail to levy sufficient taxes. The deliberate purpose of the revenue bill is to compel economy in expenditures by restricting taxation. The bill is based on the conviction that this is a time to economize and retrench; to reduce taxes and not to juggle or manipulate taxes. The Republican conferees have accepted as their first duty the task of raising in taxes enough revenue to pay, without borrowing, all the ordinary expenditures of the Government. They have, however, gone further than that. They have proposed taxes sufficient to cover not only the ordinary expenditures of the Government but to provide in addition $265,754,865 to be used through the sinking fund for the reduction of the public debt. Beyond that point, however, it was not thought wise to go. This is no time to impose—beyond the amount required to meet current expenses and maintain the sinking fund—new or additional taxes. It is a fitting time to halt expenditures by refusing to vote taxes.

Due provision has been made for reduction of the public debt. The budget of expenditures which the new tax bill is designed to balance and in greater part to cover authorizes expenditures for the extinguishment of public debt amounting in all to $381,354,865, the details of which may be found in the statements or letters of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated August 4, 1921, and August 10, 1921. In the face of this program involving debt reduction of $381,354,865, which figure does not include the $170,000,000 hereafter mentioned, the bill will be attacked by Democratic critics for not providing enough taxes, as it has been attacked in the past because it is proposed to refund, or to meet from loans, maturing debt obligations in the amount of $170,000,000—debts contracted by a Democratic administration, the proceeds of which were spent by a Democratic administration, but the burden of which must be borne by a Republican administration. The Democrats sneer at our efforts to save, criticize executive heads for promises to live well within their appropriations, and by inevitable inference spur the administration to spend more money and levy heavier taxes.

The revenue act of 1921 is a transitional or temporary measure. It does not place the tax system on a stable or scientific basis. But it is better than the law which it will supersede because of the reduction of the tax burden and the technical or administrative improvements which it effects. It repeals outright transportation and miscellaneous sales or nuisance taxes which in the fiscal year 1921 yielded $326,630,266; and it reduces taxes on soft drinks, admissions, candy, and so forth, which produced $196,482,943 in the fiscal year 1921 to an annual yield of $127,400,000. The miscellaneous consumption or sales taxes have been reduced in all $395,713,209 or, ignoring tobacco and alcoholic liquors, by more than one-half. This alone would make the bill worthy of adoption. It is, as has been said, a temporary measure. But nothing better than a temporary measure will be possible until the people of this country give to the question of Federal taxation an amount and kind of study which it has not yet received; until, in particular, the people become convinced of the sincerity and truth of the contention that the proposal to reduce excessive tax rates is not designed to relieve the rich and the profiteer, but to avert the breakdown of the income tax, unshackle business, and increase the tax revenue.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, at whatever length I might address the Senate, I do not know that I could add to the statement concisely set forth in the paper just read. The effort has been made to put in a concise form the results embodied in the report and in the work of the majority of the Finance Committee, as ultimately agreed to by the conferees representing the two bodies of Congress.

In my opinion the bill at first glance will fail to meet the expectations and requirements of many people; but I make the prediction that in the long run the measure will be found to be substantially good. It contains many excellent provisions for the relief of the taxpayer and the alleviation or removal of inequitable and unequal conditions. I know that as these relief provisions are learned, and the taxpayer becomes familiar with them, they will be greatly appreciated.

Mr. President, the measure as set forth in the statement is calculated to raise substantially the revenue required. Neither the productive powers of the bill nor the requirements of the Government can be gauged with mathematical certainty; but substantially I feel that it is safe for the Congress to go on with this bill as calculated to meet all emergencies.

I shall not at this time detain the Senate further. I know that at last the conclusion has been reached that this body might as well pass this bill and adjourn, and that there is a strong desire on the part of the House and the Senate for an adjournment; and unless occasion should require something further I am perfectly willing to stand on the statement which has just been read, and which will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I have had some communications about certain witnesses before the Finance Committee on the tariff bill. May I ask whether the committee is to have hearings during the vacation on the tariff bill?

Mr. PENROSE. The committee have not definitely determined the question of hearings, because they have not yet been informed as to the wishes of those who may desire to appear before the committee. I am informed, however, that the majority of the members of the committee will remain in Washington, and are perfectly ready to go on with the hearings if the persons interested in the schedules are ready to come forward during the vacation.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator can not give us any idea at this time as to when the tariff bill will be reported out?

Mr. PENROSE. No; I can not. The effort of the committee is to keep the hearings down to a minimum, and to have them as brief and concise as is possible. The Senator, from his long experience, knows what that effort is. The committee is ready, however, to sit every day and all day from now on. There has been some interruption on account of this bill; but that is over now, and the tariff bill will be proceeded with.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am going to ask the indulgence of the Senate, because my physical condition is such that I feel hardly able to discuss this matter at all, and I would not discuss it but for the fact that I was the only minority conferee who attended the sessions of the conference.

It is not my purpose to discuss again the merits or demerits of this measure. These, I think, have been sufficiently threshed out upon the floor of the Senate, and I am glad to believe that the country now understands the general character of this measure. I am satisfied that as a result of the discussion which has taken place heretofore the country understands that this is a measure framed in the interest of corporations and big business, rather than in the interest of the masses of the people. It is my purpose to discuss the measure again, at some other time, especially after it gets into operation, for I believe that as soon as it is put into operation its defects, its incongruities, its inconsistencies, its injustices, and its inequities will be made more manifest to the people than they are now. All I desire to discuss to-day are the Senate amendments, the fate they met in conference, and the changes made by the conferees in the bill as it left the Senate.

There were several hundred amendments adopted in the Senate. Most of those amendments, however, were formal and clerical. There were probably 50 or 60 or more amendments which affected matters of administration. Those were discussed but very little in the Senate, and were generally adopted without objection. They were amendments brought to the committee by the experts of the Treasury Department, especially by that distinguished scholar and master of the subject of revenue, Dr. Adams, representing the Secretary of the Treasury, as I understood and as the committee, I think, understood. Those amendments were generally drafted outside of the committee, brought to the committee, explained, and accepted, of course not all of them, but generally they were accepted. A number of them were redrafted after some discussion tending to develop the opinion of the committee with reference to them.

I can not say, and I think no member of the committee will say, that those administrative amendments were as thoroughly comprehended by the membership of the committee as they should have been, because they were exceedingly technical, in the first place, and in the second place, the members of the committee from the beginning of its work in drafting this bill were constantly under whip and spur. Though we had been in extraordinary session for five or six months, and nothing had been done in the way of redeeming the Republican pledges to the people of immediate relief from taxes, we were urged in the last minute, after that long delay, to proceed with haste and expedition, and for that reason these amendments were not given the consideration which they should have had.

I do not say, with respect to any of these amendments, that the members of the committee were misled, purposely or otherwise; I would not say that. But, Mr. President, I do feel that with respect to these administrative amendments we shall find, upon their application, that they contain many provisions vitally affecting the ultimate sums the taxpayers will have to pay which escaped our attention, and which will probably in some instances reduce the taxes of certain taxpayers more than the committee would have consented to reduce them, and increase the taxes of others more than the committee would have consented to increase them had the effect of these provisions been fully understood.

I had hoped, when we began this revision, that we would have abundant time for consideration of every provision of the bill which might vitally affect the interests of the taxpayer. I think the taxpayers of the country had the right to ask that much of us, and I think it is a matter of extreme regret that this measure, which the country was told was going to be thoroughgoing and scientific and equitable and just, was brought to us so late that we had to act upon it with such haste as to make it impossible to give that consideration to it which the importance of the matter demanded.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] in the statement which he has just caused to be read by the clerk says the bill is a makeshift. If it is a makeshift with reference to its taxing features, which are plain and simple, and can be easily understood, it must be a worse makeshift with reference to those provisions which are difficult to understand, which are technical, and which in many instances mean so much in their effect upon the burden which will ultimately have to be assumed by the taxpayers.

It is not such a measure with respect even to the quality of certainty, to the quality of consistency, to the quality of equalization of the burden of taxation, as the people of this country have been promised by the dominant party. So plain is this, that when we had finished our deliberations even prominent Republican majority members of the conference could not conceal their disgust for the bill and could not refrain from expressing doubts as to whether it would be preferable to the present law.

I wanted to say that much about the administrative features. I am very much afraid of them. I hope the Senate will never again have to act upon such important matters with the speed and with such lack of that deliberation which characterizes, and ought to characterize, this great law-making body, as was exhibited in this instance.

I want to speak briefly about the result of the conference, and I say right at the threshold that the bill as it was brought into the Senate by the committee was, in its vital features, much improved and bettered by the amendments which the Senate placed upon it, not amendments which the Senate placed upon it with the voluntary consent of the majority, but amendments which the Senate placed upon it through the cooperation of the Democrats on this side of the Chamber with a certain element on the majority side who are closer to the people than the dominant element which controls the organization on the other side. But for that cooperation, in which the controlling element over there, known as the old guard, was occasionally forced to join, the bill as it passed the Senate of the United States would have been a much worse bill even than it was.

I did fear, when that measure went to conference, that the stage was set for the slaughter of these beneficent amendments which had so greatly improved the bill. I am sorry to say that that would possibly have been the fate of this bill in conference; that there were many signs and indications that that would have been the fate of this bill in conference, but for coercive influences, in some instances from the outside, and but for the facts which were marshaled and presented which could not be disputed, which had to be accepted, and being accepted, made it impossible for the majority members of the conference to deal with some of these amendments as they would have liked to deal with them.

But, Mr. President, I am glad to say that as the result of those influences and that pressure the amendments placed upon the bill by the cooperation which I have mentioned have not all been slaughtered. Three or four of them have been slaughtered, but the larger number of them have been retained. I congratulate the country that so much was saved. I was there every hour of the time, and I know the sentiment and the desires which permeated the controlling element of that committee. I know that if they could have had their way, all or practically all of the Senate amendments would have gone the way of the three or four to which I have referred.

Let me enumerate briefly some of the important amendments made in the Senate which were retained in conference.

In the first place, upon the very threshold of our discussion in the Senate the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] brought to the attention of the Senate a very grave matter with reference to one of the principal provisions of the bill. That related to the distribution of assets representing earnings accumulated before 1913. The Senate amendments with respect to that matter have been retained in the main, not altogether; but as that particular provision of the bill comes back to the Senate it is made clear that the decision of the Supreme Court as to the constitutional rights of the citizen with respect to income earned before the adoption of the income-tax amendment to the Constitution shall not be ignored even by the most anxious Secretary of the Treasury or Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and that those constitutional rights shall not be denied and that income, directly or indirectly, by evasion or by juggling, in violation of the fundamental law of the land, and the decision of its highest court, be made to pay a tax to the Federal Government.

I know how eagerly the Treasury Department, pressed for money, pressed for revenue to meet the obligations of the Government, seeks to add to its store of funds. I can perhaps pardon that department for sending to the committee through its experts the amendment which thinly veiled the purpose to subject this income to taxation in the interest of revenue. I am pleased to say that the conference report upon this important subject is entirely satisfactory and effectually protects from this outrage upon their rights the owners of this income.

I shall only discuss those amendments which, because they are vital matters, formed the subject of earnest discussion here upon the floor of the Senate. There are some matters of consequence that did not attract any attention upon the floor of the Senate. I am not going to consider them at all. I have only selected those outstanding amendments which we discussed here and which we added to the bill, for they were the principal issues with which the conference had to deal. The other things were matters of relatively small consequence, most of them being unobjectionable, and if anything was done as to them it was in the main simply in the interest of clarity.

One of the big questions which arose in the beginning of the deliberations of the Senate upon this measure grew out of the provision in the House bill exempting from taxation foreign traders and domestic corporations engaged in foreign trade, 80 per cent of whose business was done abroad or whose income was derived from business done abroad. How that amendment got into the bill in the House I can not understand, but I do understand that the amendment affected a great and powerful corporate interest in this country, and I do understand and the people know that the party in power is exceedingly anxious, as the bill in all of its features touching corporations shows, to favor the corporations wherever it can, and in dealing out its favors pays but scant attention to the interests of the people as a whole as they may be affected by giving these favors to the few.

That provision was in the bill, but I do not know whence it came. I can not believe that the members of the committee of the House, representing the popular branch of our Government, of their own mind and conception deliberately proposed to give that gratuity to some of the richest and most powerful corporations, who have been heretofore and are now profiteering to as great an extent as any others engaged in business of any kind in the United States. I do not believe that. That provision came from "higher up." That proposition came from some source profoundly interested in advancing the interests of consolidated, coordinated, combined, and predatory wealth. Well, we had a battle royal here over it and by a bare majority we struck it out.

The more I thought about that proposition the more it aroused me. I was keenly apprehensive that in the conference the Senate action would be summarily reversed. I had neglected to advise myself up to the time of the vote with reference to the effect of this provision upon the finances of the Government and exactly what it would mean to those corporations, which would be its beneficiaries. I began to investigate that. I got the facts, and the facts were startling. I say to the Senate to-day that if that provision had been agreed to by the conference committee as it came to us from the House it would have been nothing more or less than a present out of the Treasury of the United States to the great, powerful corporations who control our foreign commerce, sell our exports abroad, and buy our imports abroad, to say nothing about the great international bankers, of something near $300,000,000.

Mr. President, when this matter came up in the conference—I must say it, because it ought to be said—I know but one friend which that Senate amendment had among the conferees on the part of the Senate. It seemed destined to go where the woodbine twineth. I brought to the attention of that conference the calculations of Mr. McCoy, the Government actuary, which I now have before me, with reference to how much revenue would be lost from the Treasury and what a royal gift it would constitute to those corporations engaged in that trade, and, the manifest purpose of the conferees with respect to this amendment was suddenly changed. And so the Senate's action safeguarding the rights of the people in this respect, protecting the interests of the Treasury, refusing to permit this donation to a favored few, was approved and agreed to in conference.

The great fight that was made in behalf of that amendment was made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I seconded him with all of my power, and he is entitled, as are the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives of the United States and the people of the United States, to be congratulated that this amendment was saved from the slaughter which had been prepared for it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What was the amount of the saving to which the Senator refers?

Mr. SIMMONS. It was estimated at $300,000,000. Mr. McCoy tells me this morning, however, that that estimate was based upon a certain conjectural situation, but, fully discounting that conjectural situation, he tells me it could not be, in his judgment, less than $200,000,000.

One of the questions which was discussed here to a very great extent was a provision which the House had incorporated in the bill continuing the capital-stock tax upon corporations. The bill came to the Senate in that shape, and yet, Mr. President, so eager were the majority members of the committee to cut down the taxes of the corporations that they almost incontinently in committee struck out the House provision carrying $75,000,000 of tax upon the stock of the corporations of the United States. Every Senator here knows what a fight I and others had upon the floor to prevent the old guard from having their way with respect to that amendment. We won the fight. Of course, we struck the amendment out, and the matter was not in conference. The capital-stock tax had to stay, and it did stay. I am only referring to it now for the purpose of showing that among the good things that the Democrats and the agricultural and progressive bloc protected from destruction in some instances upon the floor, and in other instances put into the bill, this was one of the things which they protected upon the floor and put beyond the reach of the conferees. That was a good piece of work, Mr. President.

Then it will be remembered that I offered many amendments, one of them being to restore the capital-stock tax, to which I have just referred; another one to repeal the $2,000 exemption given to corporations under the present law. That was one of the amendments which the so-called bloc on the other side dealt with. I do not mean to say they dealt with my amendment, but they dealt with a substitute for my amendment. They dealt with it in a sympathetic spirit, as they dealt with the capital-stock tax amendment in a sympathetic spirit, and as they dealt with the other amendments which I offered in a sympathetic spirit. Where they did not deal with those amendments they dealt with the subject. It is no remarkable thing that men who are at heart in favor of equal rights to all men and the distribution of the burdens of Government according to the ability of men to pay should act together. It is nothing strange that that class of men on the other side of the Chamber in a fight like this, when the purpose of the majority was made so plain and so patent, should have joined together to save the interests of the people from destruction and made this bill, which was unspeakably bad in the first instance, at least as to some parts of it, tolerable. The agricultural and progressive bloc presented for this amendment a substitute limiting the exemption to corporations whose income did not exceed $25,000. While logically I do not see the reason of that exception from the general rule, I acquiesced in it, because I saw that the small corporations under the spirit in which the majority members were handling this subject were being discriminated against in favor of the larger corporations, making a group within a group to which this discriminative principle was being applied. For this reason I consented to the modification.

Mr. President, in conference, notwithstanding that amendment occupied an advanced position over the amendment which increased the corporate income tax from 12½ to 15 per cent, when it was reached it was received coldly and action upon it deferred until the latter amendment was reached and disposed of. It was evident that its fate was in the balance, because it would have imposed a tax of $30,000,000 upon the corporations to which they would otherwise not be subject. It was put aside, and not taken up again until after we had reached and disposed of the corporate income tax, cutting off one-half of the increase which had been made, giving back to the corporations $140,000,000 which the Senate had imposed upon them to recoup partially—and only partially—the tremendous load that had been taken off of their backs by the repeal of the excess-profits tax. After the corporation income tax amendment of the Senate had been duly assassinated and laid out and the last ceremonies had been performed and the burial completed, they took this amendment up and graciously consented to it. They could not well do anything else, for, if they had taken that off, after taking off the excess-profits tax and the 2½ per cent additional tax which the Senate imposed, they would have given the corporations pretty much all of the reductions made in this bill, outside of those which pertain to the transportation taxes and the miscellaneous taxes. That was saved, Mr. President, but it was saved because the axmen felt that it would be indecent to cut down this little sapling after they had cut down this great tree right by the side of it; they apprehended that it might be looked upon as a complete surrender to the corporations. They therefore desisted.

As to the transportation tax, that was not in conference, and, of course, its repeal had to be agreed to. That is another tax that has been lifted from the shoulders of the great consuming masses of this country by means of the cooperation between these same elements whose hearts beat in unison with the interests of the masses and who interfered on the floor of the Senate and would not permit the adoption of the amendment of the Finance Committee, which would have reimposed one-half of the transportation tax which the Representatives of the people in the other branch of the Congress had taken off. Fortunately, by the cooperation of these groups to which I have referred, we put that amendment beyond the reach of the sword of the element that controls in the Finance Committee and that in the main controlled the conference.

Mr. President, I am enumerating now things that we did here that have not been touched. I want the Senate and I want the country to understand that we—a part of the Republican Party and most of the Democratic Party—put in the bill these things that mean so much to the taxpayers of this country, and we have kept them in the bill, but not without a struggle that sometimes was almost desperate.

Now, I come to the next amendment that was saved, and that is the surtax amendment.

Around that amendment most of the discussion which took place with reference to incomes revolved. Does anybody doubt what would have been the fate of that amendment but for the insistence and demand of 21 or 22 strong, stout hearts over there, spoken of derisively as the agricultural bloc or the progressive bloc—some sort of a bloc in the Republican Party which the old guard would spurn and ostracize if it dared? Is there anybody here or in the country who believes that the reactionary crowd that controls the Finance Committee, thoroughly committed to the House provision of 32 per cent, ever would have yielded to that amendment if they had not been confronted by that hard and insurmountable rule of the necessity of things? They surrendered because they were beaten, and they knew it; but, oh, my friends, I fear—I dislike to say it—I fear that that surrender carried with it a mental reservation. Yea, Mr. President, if we are to interpret the thoughts of men by their actions, I know that there was a mental reservation.

Here was a hard-fought-out amendment in the interest of the people—an amendment made for the purpose of changing a provision of the bill that made a dead line at an income of $66,000, that deliberately selected the income that represents the ordinary commercial interest upon an investment of a million dollars and made a line upon one side of which were arrayed the millionaires, and upon the other side no man whose income was beyond and above $66,000. It lifted the bulk of the surtax imposed in the present law off of this millionaire class and took practically nothing off of the surtaxes of those below that millionaire line. The amendment upon which the aggressive and progressive forces of the other side of this Chamber were lined up with this side of the Chamber removed these inequalities by materially reducing the tax which the man whose income is below $66,000 would have to pay, and properly and justly adding a reasonable amount to the 32 per cent surtaxes upon the men who have accumulated their millions of dollars. Many of them either accumulated them during the war, when profiteering was rife and when they marched to the head of the column of profiteers, or they multiplied them then. They, more than any other class of the people of this country, have profited financially by the war; and this attempt, seconded by the Secretary of the Treasury, who even wanted the maximum surtax to go down to 25 per cent, seconded by the reactionary membership of the Finance Committee, was defeated in the Senate. It went to conference. That was the issue involved. The purpose of the amendment was to increase the surtax rate to a maximum of 50 per cent, or 2 per cent less than the amendment I had introduced. What was its fate in the conference committee?

Mr. President, I go not into details; I tell not what any man in the conference did; but I do say now and here that the subject of the amendment was hardly opened in the committee before there came, hot and quick, with the vehemence of earnest desire, a suggestion from the majority conferees on the part of the Senate that a compromise should be made and that the rate should be reduced to 40 per cent instead of 50, the maximum rate in the Senate amendment. What would have happened if they had just had the power, if it had not been for that wise precaution of the House, a body that did not trust its conferees upon this question as the Senate had trusted its conferees, who felt that in dealing with a question like this, in which the interests of the masses of the country were arrayed against the interests of the classes, it was necessary for those who favored this provision in the Senate amendment to safeguard it? They did safeguard it by forcing an agreement that it should be carried back to the House for a separate vote. The House seemed to anticipate concessions by the conferees, to scent surrender on the part of this body, and seemed to feel that with their conferees, probably representing the same element in the Republican Party there that the majority of the conferees on the part of the Senate represented, it was necessary that this precaution be taken; and it was this precaution that saved the Senate amendment.

You say that is a Democratic tax. You say that is the Democratic demagogue chasing the corporations and the rich. Yet, Mr. President, in the House of Representatives, in defiance of the appeals of the Republican leadership of that body, in the very face of the earnest and almost impassioned letter which the President of the United States caused to be read in that Chamber, nearly as many Republicans in the House, defying these influences, voted to sustain that amendment as did Democrats.

Enough of that. That is another of the good things that have been saved from the shambles.

There was the community-tax provision, in which a large number of Senators in this Chamber were interested. That passed the censorship of the conference. There were a number of others of the same character—not amendments that aroused the interest and discussion aroused by these that I have referred to—that were accepted. Among them was the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with reference to corporations and partnerships, to save the partnerships from the discrimination that this bill carries against them in favor of corporations, by permitting partnerships to incorporate retroactively. That was adopted, as was the amendment offered by my good friend from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] requiring corporations to make a statement of the distribution of their earnings, the sources of those earnings, and the character of those earnings; but every companion amendment of that, every amendment having for its object the same good purpose as the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, was incontinently slaughtered. I will reach those amendments later.

Then there were some amendments of importance made by the Senate with reference to soft drinks, which I do not think it necessary to discuss, which were preserved. Then there was the amendment added by the Senate requiring the necessity for making returns to be based upon the gross income—the line being at the amount of $5,000. That is an important amendment; not an amendment, however, which affected the purse strings of the capitalists. So it was adopted.

It is necessary for me to be brief because my strength, which was but scant when I began, has nearly gone.

There were certain amendments which were not so fortunate in conference as those to which I have referred, and I shall state them without further discussion, except as to the last one, which I feel compelled to discuss.

There was, first, the estate tax amendment that was offered by my friend the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

I believe that amendment was adopted by the bloc. I think that was one of the amendments they presented to the majority members of the committee, whom they brought into rather hurried session.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will permit, I think the 50 per cent tax, which was the maximum tax proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as well as in the amendment which I proposed to offer, was adopted by the bloc and was a part of that agreement—

Mr. SIMMONS. That surrender arrangement?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was not to attach to estates until they reached a much higher amount than the amount proposed in my amendment, and I think it was the amount proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts which was adopted.

Mr. SIMMONS. However that may be, I am quite certain that it was considered primarily by the so-called bloc. I know many of them were deeply interested. That amendment was disagreed to. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts, the author of it, will discuss it. I have not the strength to undertake to discuss it now.

The next amendment was the gift amendment, offered by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. That was an amendment to which the Senate attached very great importance. We had a heated contest. The Senator from Massachusetts made one of the most brilliant speeches on that amendment that has been made in the Senate during this session of Congress, and as a result of that discussion, and the elucidation of the able Senator from Massachusetts, that amendment was adopted by a small majority. It went out in conference by a big majority. I think the Senator from Massachusetts may want to discuss it; I do not at this time.

The amendments relating to publicity of tax returns were next, one offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and one offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

I want to say, as to the action of the conference committee on that subject, that they may have thought that perhaps their action was in the interest of some class of taxpayers, whose business operations and the amount of whose taxes should not be scrutinized by the public; but if that sort of reasoning led the conference committee to refuse to open the records to the public I am at a loss to understand why the committee wished to carry that principle of the absolute secrecy of the return of the taxpayer to the point of striking out the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], which meant nothing except that a committee of the Senate or of the House should have the right to inspect taxpayers' records with reference to any matter within their jurisdiction, and which they were considering and debating, and even then not without a resolution of the Congress, authorizing them to make the inspection.

Why it is desired to put up bars against the Congress, clothed with the power of legislating with reference to taxation, clothed with the power of legislating to prevent evasions of taxation, with a solemn duty upon them to levy those taxes justly, and to see that they are not circumvented by trick or device or scheme or what not, I can not understand. I can not see why the conferees, representing the Congress, should provide for secrecy of these returns, many of them notoriously false and fraudulent and reeking with perjury, as has been shown by the fact that the scrutiny of these returns has resulted in their being checked up, and millions piled on millions in taxes, like Pelion on Ossa piled, have been recovered. Why, with this solemn duty resting upon us, we should deny ourselves, when we are dealing with this subject, the right to examine those returns is more than my intellect can understand.

Mr. President, I have known for years that whenever a revenue bill is to be framed here powerful and mighty influences get in operation to prevent Congress or anybody else from opening the books and reading the returns, in which not only the country but every citizen in the country is interested. I am just as much interested that my neighbor should pay a tax upon his earnings as I am interested in discharging my duty in that respect. He can not devise a scheme to protect his earnings and his property from his just share of taxes without infringing upon my rights and without taking from me that which is mine, because if all pay their just taxes every man will be equal with all others, and one only loses money out of his pocket and becomes unequal in the partnership of burdens when other men escape. I know the powerful influences which attempt to influence such legislation. I have been on conference committees and I have been on Senate committees heretofore.

Mr. President, this insistence, this powerful urging, this concerted action to keep these returns secret and hidden from the eyes of the people and the public, is the very reason why the light of day ought to be turned upon them. We attempted to do it. The Senate voted for it, and the Republican conferees for the Senate voted it out.

There is but one other item of great importance that was taken out by the conferees.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator just said that the conferees for the Senate voted it out.

Mr. SIMMONS. I mean by that that they consented to its going out. I know of no special fight that was made for it, and I do not think there was any.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the Senate has a right to know how its agents behaved, how the conferees representing the Senate behaved, and I call upon the Senator to state where our conferees stood on that question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I only know the majority conferees were against this item and determined to cut it out. I have been very guarded in my expressions. I have given the Senate to understand, I think, that their majority conferees were not in sympathy with many of the amendments which were retained, as well as those which were stricken out.

The most unjustifiable and unseemly thing in this whole business was the surrender of the Senate conferees without the firing of a gun, when they surrendered and gave up in glee the 2½ per cent additional tax which the Senate had placed upon corporate incomes. Oh, they said there was some sort of compromise which they were going to make. It was discovered that the gains tax amendment of the Senate, by inadvertence or otherwise, I do not know how—it was one of the administrative amendments which received very little attention, as I have stated—would require the corporations to pay a tax of substantially only 5 per cent upon their gains, while individuals would pay as high as 23 per cent in many cases, and probably an average of 15 or 16 per cent upon their gains.

I know that Senators did not know that that is what this administrative amendment meant, and they would not have known it until this day if an expert of the Treasury had not brought it to our attention in connection with the settlement of the 2½ per cent proposition as a compromise between the House and the Senate. Then we suddenly learned that there was a Senate amendment which would tax corporation gains at 5 per cent and individual gains at from 15 to 16 per cent. No one had heard of that. The experts of the Treasury, who were supposed to have had something to do with that amendment, disclosed that situation to the conferees and said, "Now, it would be a good compromise, and the Secretary of the Treasury is very much interested in this. It would be a compromise and a very good compromise probably to change the Senate amendment so as to equalize the tax which the corporations would have to pay; that is, raise the corporation tax up to 12½ per cent upon gains, which is the tax they pay upon incomes except in this case, thereby adding upon their gains a tax of 7½ per cent and bringing the individual tax down to 12½ per cent. That would be a splendid compromise, which would enable you to offset to a certain extent the additional taxes that the corporations would have to pay against the tax that you relieve them of by cutting out this 2½ per cent which the Senate added."

But when we went to investigate the amount of additional taxes which the corporations would have to pay, I believe we found that it would only be between twenty and thirty million dollars, and there was a proposition emanating, as we were told, from the Secretary of the Treasury, one in which he was deeply and profoundly interested, to swap the additional tax on corporations of from twenty to thirty million dollars for the relief of those corporations from a tax of $130,000,000.

After the matter was brought to our attention, in common justice we had to make the changes in the amendment, but I stood there—and I have not been more earnest in connection with anything in reference to this bill—and insisted that if that inequality existed it should be relieved, and speedily relieved, upon its own merits, and I refused to ask the conferees to correct an error against the people in the interest of the corporations for a consideration. I see one of the House conferees now present in the Senate Chamber. If adopted, I insisted that it should be adopted upon its merits. It was adopted and a compromise was made and the 2½ per cent taken off.

I wish I had the strength this afternoon to go on and say all that I have in mind to say about this matter. I did not expect to speak more than 20 or 25 minutes when I began, but I confess that when I begin to discuss the things and the influences that have been at work here to deny justice to the people of the country in this matter of the distribution of taxes it arouses all the fervor that is in me and leads me to efforts beyond my strength.

Think of it, Mr. President. Here are the corporations—I have now before me the table furnished by Mr. McCoy—paying just about one-half of the tax that individuals pay on incomes and gains taken together; paying but very little more than one-half as much as corporations pay under the present law. Under the conference report they would pay less than one-half the rate the individual pays. When I think about that and then think of the $410,000,000 that has been stricken off the income taxes of the country, and that the corporations will get the benefit of more than $300,000,000 of that, I am driven to bring that situation sharply to the attention of the people of the country.

The corporations now bear less than their share of the burden of taxation. Corporations representing a large part—at least one-third—of the business activities of the country, and by reason of their consolidation and organization making profits that no individual dare dream of, now, under the present law, are paying far less than their share of the taxes, and yet with one fell swoop there is taken off of the corporations by the repeal of the excess-profits taxes $400,000,000. To recoup that enormous loss in revenue, lifting that tremendous burden off the shoulders of the corporations, there is added only the pitiful sum of $110,000,000 to the taxes of corporations, thus taking off easily more than three times as much as was reimposed upon them.

Mr. President, may I have permission of the Senate to print in the Record this table without reading?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the chairman of this committee was wont, when we first met here in April, to advise the country how quickly, how speedily, how thoroughly, and how efficiently the Republican Party was going to take up the revenue bill and relieve the people of the "onerous, unnecessary, and oppressive" burdens which the wicked Democrats had imposed upon them. After waiting more than five months, impatiently waiting, appealingly waiting, this sluggish old party which claims to move with astonishing celerity and quickness of action, after two or more months spent in deliberation brings out of the committee room this abortion of a tax bill and for a while tries to bolster it up. But when in the open its iniquities and its weaknesses are presented, when it appears to the country as but a skeleton of what was promised, when the wrath of the public, finding expression not only in the Democratic dailies and in the nonpartisan dailies of the country but in the standard, orthodox publications of the Republican Party, denounced it as a monstrosity and a fraud and told of its cheating and denying the hopes and prayers and wishes of the people, they try to hurry it through, hoping that the amendments which they have been forced to accept may somewhat ameliorate the situation and help to propitiate the country.

They present it and force it through under whip and spur in this great deliberative body that never before was known to submit, with patience or otherwise, to undue haste in matters of this transcendent importance. Yet at the last minute, when all the amendments have been made, when the conference has acted, when the result has been disseminated throughout the country, they hear the rumblings still and they learn seemingly for the first time that all their efforts have not placated especially the big interests whom they have been unable to help in the way they promised to help them, because the friends of the people in the two Houses would not permit them to fully accomplish that outrage and shame. They find that the very men to whom the Republican Party is obligated by an obligation upon which it hardly dares turn its back at the last minute are still indignant and dissatisfied and demanding the favors they bought and paid for. They find these men saying, "What you promised has not been given; you do not satisfy us by telling us that you did not have the votes, by telling us about the insurrection in your own party, by telling us about the combination between the bad Democrats and the equally sinister progressive and agricultural blocs. That does not satisfy us. We have paid the price; we have had the promise; it is your business to deliver the goods."

Then, Mr. President, in the conference room when the last chapter is closed we hear remarks falling from the lips of prominent and controlling members of the conference, expressing their disgust with their work, but when we get upon the floor of the Senate the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] in one breath, when he himself was reading, said that the work was very good. "Very good!" Mr. President, it sounded so differently from some remarks which I heard fall from his lips very recently. The Senator, however, forgot that in the memoranda which he sent to the Secretary's desk and had read was embraced the statement, clear cut, that the bill was but a makeshift, merely a temporary bridge over which the old Republican Party might pass; that speedily, very speedily, we would have to make another revision of the tax laws.

Mr. President, did the Senator from Pennsylvania think that that would satisfy the demands of the men that he and his conferees wanted to please by the passage of this bill? It was, however, I grant, all he could do. His excuse to them is a promise to relieve them at a later time.

Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he and his party will not be able to revise this tax measure as much in the interests of those classes as they would wish and as they have demanded during this Congress, because on the other side of the Chamber there are at least 20 Senators whose sympathies are with the masses of the people, as are the sympathies of the rank and file on this side of the Chamber; and we shall see that the people's interests are not sacrificed to the classes. Let me say that the Old Guard's failure in this bill is a demonstration of the Republican Party's incapacity to legislate effectively in the interest of the people. It is a disclosure of their want of constructive ability and initiative. It gives the lie to all the pretenses of the past that theirs was the party of ability, of courage, and of adequate capacity for action to meet any situation. This bill will disclose the falsity of that claim; this bill will disclose the Republican weakness, as it has disclosed to the American people the desire of the Republican leaders to lift the taxes off the shoulders of a few thousand millionaires and corporations and to place it upon the shoulders of the people.

When the polls are next closed and the result is registered, Mr. President, there will be another Congress here which will safeguard the interests of the people of the United States against any such sinister invasion of their rights under the law, in equity, and in morals hereafter as is perpetrated in the bill now to be enacted.

REGISTRATION OF CHINESE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 33) permitting Chinese to register under certain provisions and conditions, which were to strike out the preamble, to strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert:

That the Commissioner General of Immigration be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to register, and to issue an appropriate certificate showing registration to, the 365 Chinese men, now temporarily domiciled in the United States, who attached themselves to the punitive military expedition under the command of Gen. Pershing which entered Mexico in 1916, and who were brought into the United States as refugees by said expedition when it returned from Mexico.

SEC. 2. That the registration hereby provided shall correspond as nearly as circumstances permit to the registration of domiciled Chinese prescribed by section 6 of the act approved May 5, 1892 (27 Stat. L., p. 25), as amended by section 1 of the act approved November 3, 1893 (28 Stat. L., p. 7), and the certificates of registration issued to such Chinese shall constitute evidence of their right to be and remain within the United States: Provided, however, That before being registered hereunder the said Chinese shall be given the examination prescribed by the immigration act of February 5, 1917 (39 Stat. L., p. 874), with the exception of the reading test prescribed by section 3 thereof, and such of them as may be found inadmissible under said act shall not be registered hereunder, but shall be deported by the Secretary of Labor in the manner prescribed by section 19 of said immigration act: Provided further, That if any of the said Chinese shall, at any time after being registered pursuant to this resolution, become members of any of the classes for the expulsion of which provision is made in section 19 of the said immigration act, they shall be taken into custody and deported upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor in accordance with the terms of said section.

SEC. 3. That the certificate of registration herein provided shall be issued to the said Chinese by the Commissioner General without charge; and it shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, to collect any fee, gift, or remuneration for services rendered, or alleged to have been rendered, said Chinese in the procurement of such certificate, or, directly or indirectly, to collect from the said Chinese any fee, gift, or remuneration for services performed in placing before Congress evidence or information on which the passage of this resolution is based; and any person who shall violate either of these provisions shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

And to amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution permitting certain Chinese to register under certain provisions and conditions."

Mr. STERLING. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator what the amendments are, and what effect they would have upon the general measure?

Mr. STERLING. I think the amendments make a great improvement on the original measure. The original joint resolution consisted for the most part of recitals and a long preamble. Those recitals are stricken out, and the substance of the joint resolution is incorporated in the House amendment, and then some safeguards are added. It is provided that these Chinese, before registration, shall take the examination prescribed by the immigration law, except the reading test. They are exempted from that. It is further provided that any who may not be able to pass the examination shall be subject to deportation, and that any who afterwards disqualify themselves by belonging to any of the orders or organizations whose members can not be admitted under the immigration law shall be deported.

Mr. KING. These are the Chinese who were with Gen. Pershing's expedition in Mexico?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KING. The matter was fully discussed here some time ago.

Mr. STERLING. They were in the punitive expedition to Mexico and rendered very valuable service in one way or another.

Mr. McKELLAR. About how many of them are there?

Mr. STERLING. There are 365 of them. Further safeguards are put upon the matter by providing that the registration certificates shall be issued free of charge, and a penalty is prescribed for anyone who attempts to procure money from these Chinese for obtaining the certificates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House.

The amendments were concurred in.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be stated.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 210) for the appointment of one member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was read twice by its title.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, upon yesterday, during the executive session but as in legislative session, I made the error of asking unanimous consent of the Senate to pass this measure. I labored under the impression that it had been messaged over from the House. It is a House joint resolution. The Senate last night passed it; but, as a matter of fact, it was not in the jurisdiction of the Senate at the time. That transaction has been stricken from the record, and I now ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Roy L. Marston, of Maine, be, and he is hereby, appointed a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States, to fill the unexpired term of Menander Dennett, deceased.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROCK RIVER BRIDGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives, which will be stated.

The bill (H. R. 8346) granting the consent of Congress to the board of supervisors of Whiteside County, Ill., to construct a bridge across Rock River, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce House bill 8346.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the board of supervisors of Whiteside County, in the State of Illinois, and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Rock River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of Sterling, in the county of Whiteside, in the State of Illinois, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAYMENT OF SALARIES FOR NOVEMBER.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 225) authorizing payment of the salaries of officers and employees of Congress for November, 1921, on the 23d day of said month, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The reading clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives are authorized and directed to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, borne on the annular and session rolls, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the full month of November, 1921, on the 23d day of said month. Such amount as may be necessary to pay the session employees from the date of the adjournment of the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress until the beginning of the second session thereof is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATEMENT AND INTERVIEW BY HON. T. P. GORE.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have here a statement and interview of former Senator Gore, who gives some pungent and interesting views on the political and economic situation of today. I ask that the statement be included in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

INTERVIEW BY HON. T. P. GORE.

I am leaving for Oklahoma within the next day or two. I will spend several weeks in the State. I am going on business and pleasure. The trip is void of political significance. I say this in order to silence speculation.

I feel that I ought to make an additional statement in behalf of my friends, who should be making their political alignments for the coming campaign. I have received numerous solicitations to enter the approaching contest for governor. I have received friendly assurances from some who have not always favored me with their support. I am deeply sensible of the compliment implied in these requests. I am deeply grateful to my friends for their confidence and fidelity. If gratitude be not a legal tender in payment of such debts, then am I a bankrupt, indeed. My appreciation is deepened by the fact that I went to defeat when I last submitted myself to the suffrage of my fellow Democrats. Fidelity in triumph is a virtue, but fidelity in defeat shineth like a jewel in the soul.

I have an abiding interest in Oklahoma, in her growth and prosperity. This interest will cease with life only. As I have said before, I prefer to spend time remembering what the people of Oklahoma have done for me rather than remembering what they did to me. I would like to see the government of our State placed on a footing of the greatest economy and efficiency. Every dollar's worth of taxes should secure a dollar's worth of service at all times. This is preeminently true in bad times. I regret the adverse conditions which Oklahoma is now suffering in common with the rest of the country and the rest of the world. I regret the disastrous consequences which overtook and overwhelmed the Democratic Party last November. But what concerns us now is not the way in but the way out of our difficulties. That there is a way out none need doubt. That the way will be short and easy none need imagine. The country should insist upon a practical and constructive program. I would like to see the Democratic Party present a practical and constructive program, espousing not the interest of a part only but the whole, a program which considers the community of interest between the farmer, laborer, and business man as vital as the bond which joined together the celebrated Siamese twins. When one of the twins died the other was apparently hale, but they suffered a common fate and shared a common grave.

This leads me to observe that I am too old-fashioned for present-day politics. There are two fatal flaws in my political creed—I still believe in the law of gravitation and I do not believe in the fairies. These are among my eccentricities. Can anyone survive in politics to-day who doubts that by a mere congressional enactment or Executive order the Government can change the established order of the universe, can suspend the relation between cause and effect, can repeal the fundamental laws of economics or eradicate the primary instincts of human nature? I could not expect such serious faults of faith to be redeemed by the mere fact that I still believe in the Constitution and in the safeguards with which it undertakes to shield the rights and liberties of the people. I believe that no person should be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The street urchin should not be stripped of the rags upon his back without his consent or without compensation. "Due process of law" is the finest fruit of more than 60 centuries of evolution. I believe in a government of law as distinguished from a government of men. I am opposed to autocracy, no matter how brilliant the autocrat. I am opposed to an oligarchy, no matter who constitutes the governing faction or the reigning mob. I believe with Jefferson in a government based upon the consent of the governed. I believe with Lincoln in a government of the people, by the people, and last, but not least, for the people. I believe in a democracy where the majority has both the right and the power to govern, but the majority should exercise its power to govern under such restraints as will safeguard the rights and liberties of the minority. The rights and liberties of the minority should be sacred and secure, even though it consists of a single individual, and even though that individual be destitute alike of friends, influence, and fortune.

I have, of course, the greatest respect for the wishes of my friends, but I can not accept their conclusion that I should enter the contest for governor. There are several sufficient reasons which make it impracticable for me to contest the governorship. I shall not detail them. It is only necessary to say that the senatorial contest last year became exceptionally acrimonious. It was surcharged with crimination. If I should now seek the governorship, if I should now seek the chief magistracy of the State, it would be regarded by many and accepted by some as a challenge. This would engender strife when harmony within the party is essential to the triumph of Democratic principles. I have no disposition to fan the smoldering embers into flame, but rather to quench them. I have no disposition to fling the apple of discord into the councils of the party. I shall take an interest in politics, but stripped of my shoulder straps. I shall do so as a high private. Even though I were ambitious to be governor of Oklahoma, I should feel constrained to subordinate my personal ambition to the duty of advancing the principles and improving the prospects of genuine Democracy.

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1921.

HON. GEORGE L. BOWMAN,
Democratic National Committeeman from Oklahoma, Kingfisher, Okla.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of late date inquiring my views as to the proposed meeting of the national Democratic committee to consider the election of a successor to the national chairman, George White. I appreciate your request and the opportunity to give expression to my views. I also appreciate your desire to take the sense of the party on this and other questions. This is a course recommended by wisdom as respects even those whose voice is least likely to be heard and whose counsel is least likely to be heeded.

I believe in party government. It is not perfect. It is the best, however, which the experience and wisdom of man have yet devised. I think that much can be done and everything possible should be done to improve the prospects of the Democratic Party. Wrangling over the national chairmanship will not contribute to that end. Chairman White is not responsible for the disaster which befell us last fall. The torrent had gone over the precipice before he was pressed into commission and human power could not then reverse the cataract. If the Democratic nominee had assumed a different attitude or had taken a different tack toward the so-called paramount issue, he might have fared further and fared better. But I assume that he pursued the course dictated by his judgment and his conscience. We can not mend the past. We can, in some measure, direct the future.

There should be a resurvey of Democratic principles and a new consecration to those principles. The party should stand for a government of laws as distinguished from a government of men. A government of men in every time and in every clime has ended in tyranny. A government of laws is the only hope and the only security for freedom. Autocracy and democracy are the antipodes of politics. A cross between the two is a political monstrosity. Unless everybody knows more than anybody, democracy is false in theory and must fail in practice.

The party should take its stand for the rights of man, for the rights of the citizen, for the personal rights of the humblest, as well as for the property rights of the highest—for the personal and property rights of all without distinction. It should stand for those inalienable rights which constitute the breath of the life of liberty—a free press, unpurchased and unpersecuted—freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and freedom of conscience—those things without which freedom is but a mockery and democracy is but a name.

The party should stand for the fundamental principles underlying our Federal system—for the rights and powers of the States within their appointed sphere of action as well as for the rights of our General Government within its appointed sphere of action. A confusion of things fundamental leads to chaos.

The party should stand for the constitutional partition of the powers of the Federal Government into the legislative, executive, and judicial departments. It should defend the powers of each against any encroachment on the part of the others. No department should be allowed to invade the province or to usurp the power of any other. All human experience testifies with one voice that the separation of those powers is indispensable to liberty. Their consolidation is the unflinching cause of despotism.

The party should stand for the fundamental principles of economics. It should respect those laws of economics which can not be disregarded with impunity, which can not be disregarded without disaster. Economic outlawry never prospers well. If policies are to be judged by their consequences, that Democrat is an optimist indeed who views recent economic adventures of the Democratic Party with entire approval and complacency.

The party should stand for the most rigorous economy in power as well as out of power. Every dollar expended should purchase a dollar's worth of service. Otherwise the taxpayer is cheated and the Government is particeps criminis.

The party should stand for the lowest taxation consistent with the requirements of the public service and the public credit. Taxes should not only be as low as circumstances will allow, but should also be just and equal—should be founded upon sound principles. A system of taxation which helps one citizen and hurts another, which benefits one class and burdens another, is incompatible alike with justice and permanent prosperity.

The party should stand for the promotion of both domestic and foreign commerce. Trade is a blessing, not a curse. We can not sell to others unless we buy from others. Others can not buy from us unless we buy from them. Trade is nothing more nor less than the exchange of goods, and is advantageous to all parties concerned. We should not through shortsighted tariff restrictions forfeit our newly acquired position as the creditor nation of the world.

The party should stand for even-handed justice alike to labor and capital, demanding equal protection for both and refusing to become the patron of either to the prejudice of the other. Business is not a crime, and business men should not be presumed to be criminals. The Government should discriminate between the honest and the dishonest and should be as industrious to protect the one as to punish the other. Farming is a business, and the farmer is a business man. A system of short-time rural credits should be instituted as part of an improved system for the marketing of farm products. The party's watchword in State and Nation should be "ECONOMIZE TILL IT HURTS."

As concerns international affairs, time and experience have revealed no wiser principle and no safer guide than was contained in the inaugural address of Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic Party. "Honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none." The relations that obtain between independent nations are founded upon interest and not upon sentiment. If America will not take care of her own, she will find that dependence upon others is the vanity of vanities.

Why is government, anyhow? What is it all about? Why all this intricate and magnificent mechanism? Why this elaborate system of county, State, and National organizations, with all their powers and majesty? It is to protect the individual in the enjoyment of his rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It is to maintain equal opportunities for him to pursue happiness with some prospect of attaining happiness. With equality of opportunities, let unequal talents and thrift enjoy their legitimate rewards. Add to this the performance of those public and essential services which the Government can better perform for the individual than the individual can perform for himself and you have a catalogue of the true functions of self-government and free institutions. That government which, instead of preserving and protecting the rights of its citizens, violates them sins the deepest sin and incurs the deepest guilt of which human government is capable.

The party government itself should be democratic. Those who are selected for leadership and those who assume leadership should take counsel of the rank and file of the party. The true function of the Democratic organization is to elect Democratic candidates, not to select Democratic candidates. To forget this truth is to commandeer defeat. What the Democratic Party needs now is a few active recruiting stations. It needs those much more than it needs presidential aspirants. Let the dead past be its own sexton. The living should address themselves to the future. If the Democratic Party will but be democratic, hope will revive and victory will return. It will find, as I observed on the eve of our late catastrophe, that after the darkness cometh the dawn.

With assurances of the highest esteem and best wishes,

T. P. GORE.

CONDITIONS IN IRELAND.

MR. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I submit a resolution which I ask to have printed and lie on the table, to be called up by me at the earliest opportunity when Congress assembles on December 5. I ask to have it read. It is very short.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 173) was read, as follows:

Whereas friendly relations between the United States and Great Britain are vital to the peace of the world; and
Whereas conflict between Great Britain and Ireland is a constant menace to those amicable relations so earnestly desired by the people of the United States: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States expresses the hope that the differences between Great Britain and Ireland, now the subject of negotiations at London between the representatives of the two Governments, may be speedily composed by a treaty of peace and amity, which will guarantee Great Britain against hostile aggression and secure the recognition of the existing government in Ireland.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

CLAIMS GROWING OUT OF FEDERAL CONTROL OF RAILROADS, ETC.

MR. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read; and I shall follow that with a request for unanimous consent for its present consideration.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 174) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Director General of the Railroad Administration be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate, on or before December 10, 1921, the following statements and accounts with reference to the settlement of claims growing out of Federal control of the railroads and the administration of the affairs committed to him by the transportation act:

1. A statement of account between the Government and the carriers from the beginning of Federal control down to December 1, 1921, showing clearly and concisely the amount of funds which have been appropriated or otherwise put at the disposal of the Railroad Administration; the purposes for which said funds have been paid or expended; the amount of indebtedness incurred by the railroads for all purposes, including additions and betterments, equipment, and permanent and temporary loans; the amount of claims filed by the carriers prior to December 1, 1921; the estimated amount of claims still remaining to be filed; and setting up as of December 1, 1921, a balance between the amounts due the railroads on all accounts arising out of Federal control and the resources available to the Railroad Administration for the payment or offset thereof; the purpose of said statement being to provide a clear and intelligible account of the financial relations between the railroads and the Government from the beginning of Federal control down to date.

2. A statement showing in detail and by individual carriers the claims which have been settled down to December 1, 1921, and setting forth in parallel columns for each road with corresponding totals for all roads (a) the amount claimed to be due from the Government on account of each principal item, including compensation, money taken over, maintenance of way and structures, maintenance of equipment, materials and supplies, and depreciation; (b) the "set-up" by the Railroad Administration as against such claims, i. e., the finding by the divisions of review of the Railroad Administration as to the amount of such claims which are, in the view of the Government, valid under the contracts; and (c) the basis of settlement finally arrived at by the director general and his staff in conference with the representatives of each railroad company, showing the amount offset on account of each variety of indebtedness, the amount paid in cash, and the amount of indebtedness which has been funded; the purpose of said statement being to show in concise form the character of the settlement which has been made with each individual road.

TAX REVISION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

MR. PENROSE. Mr. President, I now submit to the Senate a request for unanimous consent:

That the Senate shall meet in recess on to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, and that on or before 5 o'clock on the afternoon of the same day a final vote shall be had upon the conference report now pending before the Senate on the revenue bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understand the Senator's proposition to be that at 5 o'clock a vote shall be taken without further debate.

Mr. PENROSE. Not later than 5 o'clock. My request is that the Senate shall meet in recess at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning, and that not later than 5 o'clock on the afternoon of the same day a final vote shall be had on the conference report on the pending revenue measure.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Without further debate?

Mr. PENROSE. Of course; a final vote, I say.

Mr. SIMMONS. Speaking for myself, I shall not feel disposed to object to that, unless some who desire to discuss this matter feel that if such an agreement is made they would not have sufficient time to discuss it.

Mr. ROBINSON. A number of Senators about me have suggested that the debate probably will not run as late as 5 o'clock, and that if Senators are to reach home in time for the Thanksgiving festivities, they must leave the city to-morrow afternoon. I have wondered if the agreement to vote could not be altered so as to bring the time forward to 3 o'clock, for instance. It is the opinion of some Senators about me here that that should be done.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that the request for unanimous consent is that the vote shall be taken at not later than 5 o'clock. If opportunity has been afforded before 3 o'clock for everybody to speak who desires to speak on this important proposition the vote can be taken then. Otherwise, I think the desire of Senators to attend upon social and other festivities at home should yield to important business of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no purpose or intention of objecting to the request for unanimous consent. My thought was that if a Senator expected to leave to-morrow he would like to know in advance that he would be able to do so, and if he could not know that, he might be prevented from going at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Possibly he could arrange for a pair to meet the particular situation.

Mr. ROBINSON. I made the suggestion because I was requested to do so by a number of Senators about me. I have no purpose or intention of objecting to the request.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it would be quite easy for us to get through by 3 o'clock, and probably before that hour. Still, I think it would be better to extend the time to 5 o'clock in case it should be found necessary. I do not think it will be found necessary.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think very likely it will be possible to get through earlier than that hour. I do not know how many Senators desire to be heard, but I think as a matter of safety, and to provide full opportunity for Senators to discuss this important proposition, we had better fix 5 o'clock as the hour. If we can conclude the discussion of the bill before that time, well and good.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it the purpose to have the Senate adjourn after this unanimous-consent agreement is entered into?

Mr. PENROSE. It is my purpose to move a recess.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania about the number of Senators, if any, who desire to speak in support of the conference report.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not informed of any Senator desiring to speak in behalf of the conference report, and only one or two in opposition to it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If there is no one who intends to speak in support of the report, I think it is quite likely that we shall conclude the discussion so as to get a vote by 3 o'clock; but I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin, and apparently it is the sentiment of others, that we might fix the time at 5 o'clock, and of course if we can expedite the discussion, and all work to that end, we can bring about a vote at an earlier hour.

Mr. PENROSE. It is a matter of entire indifference to me what hour is fixed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I may say that the views of the majority of the committee in support of the conference report have only been submitted this afternoon. They have not been printed, and Senators have had no chance to study them or to give them any considerable thought. I have managed to get them page by page, and during the very learned discussion of the Senator from North Carolina I have been trying to listen to him and read the views of the majority at the same time; but if there is no one who desires to occupy much time in support of the conference report, I feel certain that we shall be able to conclude the discussion by 5 in the afternoon to-morrow, and I hope at a much earlier hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not recall, but I believe we have had no quorum call on this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not required.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is the final passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I offer the following concurrent resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 15) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring): That the two Houses of Congress shall adjourn on Wednesday, the 23d day of November, 1921, and that when they adjourn on said day they stand adjourned sine die.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I realize that Senators are desirous of having a recess after this long special session of the Congress. Personally, however, I am opposed to that proposition at this time, and I think I have as high a regard for my mileage, and am quite as much in need of it, as Senators who are so anxious to adjourn.

But I have been thinking about the experiences we have had during the last six or seven months. The Republican Party is charged with the responsibility for legislation; but the minority, aided and abetted by a few Republican Senators who have no regard for the responsibilities of the Republican Party, have made it impossible, under the rules of the Senate, to transact its business effectively.

There are many things which ought to be done, many things which ought to have been done in the past. If an account could be had of the expense caused to the people of this country by Senators who have occupied the floor of the Senate for the purposes of delay, for the purpose of confusing the issue, and for manufacturing political capital—if that account could be had, as possibly it will be had, the people would understand somewhat of the luxury which filibustering under the rules of the Senate is.

I repeat that the Republican Party is charged with the responsibility of legislation, but under our rules it has been impossible, apparently, to exercise that responsibility in an effective manner. Obstructionist Senators have insisted, whenever an effort was being made to legislate, that legislation was being "jammed" through the Senate. When an attempt has been made to hold night sessions, there has always been opportunity, which has been improved by Senators, to prevent consideration of bills before the Senate, until out of sheer exhaustion the Senate has been obliged to adjourn without making any progress.

I know that this is considered good politics on the part of the minority, and probably it has been exercised by Senators on this side when they were in the minority; nevertheless, I contend that it is a bad practice and is bringing and has brought the Senate into disrepute. Never were conditions of the country more disturbed or more in need of such relief as legislation can give, and yet filibustering is indulged and action delayed.

I offered a resolution some time ago to amend the rules of the Senate by providing that a majority might invoke cloture of the kind which we now have, only that it shall be brought about by a majority instead of a two-thirds vote. Under that rule a motion for cloture would have to lie over for a day, and then, after it had been debated for two days, it would come up for a vote, and if two-thirds of the Senate decided that cloture was desirable, from that time on no Senator could speak more than once on any bill or amendment or more than an hour, which would mean that 96 hours of debate could be indulged after cloture was invoked. Is that undue restriction of debate?

I realize the situation we are in now, and have been in for a long time. We have been discussing for several days the so-called Newberry case, and because some Senators desire—I will not characterize it by the term in which I think it ought to be characterized—but because some Senators desire to take a trip down to Haiti it is proposed that we shall put off a vote on a matter which has been debated here for days until some time at the beginning of next year when these Senators may have returned. I am not going to object to the unanimous-consent request for a time to vote in January, because I find it is absolutely necessary to consent if we are ever to have a vote on the question. The resolution which I offered to amend the rules has been opposed because it was said it would interfere with pending legislation, and therefore it could not be consented to.

It has been contended that unlimited debate should be permissible, and that any resolution would interfere with pending business. Could anything be devised which would more interfere with and delay action than the course which has been and is now being followed in the Senate?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will ask the Senator to excuse me until I get through with this statement.

I propose that instead of adjourning and going to our homes now in order to obtain the mileage which some of us think we ought to have, we stay in session and debate that rule until the 5th day of December, if necessary, in order that we can determine whether—

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that this resolution is not debatable. It is a resolution in relation to adjournment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will have to state that the resolution is not yet before the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I thought it was before the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It was my understanding it was not before the Senate, and that is why I rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire if there is objection to its immediate consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I object, until I get through with my statement.

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a point of order. Is not a motion to adjourn always in order?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think I can be taken off the floor by any Senator for the purpose of making the motion.

Mr. LODGE. Any Senator must yield when another rises to make a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to adjourn is always in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Would a motion to adjourn be in order while I have the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No motion to adjourn has been entertained by the Chair. The Chair answered a parliamentary inquiry raised by the Senator from Massachusetts as to whether a motion to adjourn was always in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will proceed by stating—

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me finish this sentence and I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to inquire what is before the Senate; and if there is nothing before the Senate, I make the point of order that the Senator from Michigan is out of order.

Mr. CURTIS. The conference report is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the conference committee on the revenue bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I wish to repeat that I am in favor of remaining in session for the purpose of taking up the amendment to the rules allowing Senators who wish to indulge in unlimited debate to discuss that question from now until the 5th day of December.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President—

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan if he can, with a straight face, hold the Democrats of this Chamber responsible for the monstrous and outrageous delay in the Newberry case, a delay that has now gone on for nearly three years.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It has been thoroughly explained why there has been that delay. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and others agreed that the matter ought not to be taken up while it was in the court for trial in Grand Rapids. After that the counting of the ballots was taken up. After the decision of the Supreme Court an investigation was had by the committee. Their report has been on the desks of Senators for weeks.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the committee and the managers in the Senate did not call it up until November 15.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That report has been on the desks of Senators for weeks.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We, on this side of the Chamber, do not control the order of procedure.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not saying that you do; I am not claiming that you do, but you do control the determination of questions, and this I contend no minority has a right to do. I am asking for some rule whereby the majority can control the order of business of the Senate and its final determinations, as I think the majority ought and by the country is expected to do. That is what I am contending for.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has admitted, even with the tardy and long delay before, that the committee report was made in September, and yet it was not called up for action by the Senate until November 15.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Because we had the tax legislation before us, and other matters which seemed to be absolutely necessary for consideration. But the question is now up before us and has been debated for several days. I would like to proceed now to a conclusion and thus avoid delay and expense. However, I recognize the fact that the Senator from Ohio wishes to go to Haiti, and I will agree to the unanimous-consent agreement for a vote in January, so far as that is concerned, because, as I have said, I must agree in order to get a vote at any time, and it seems to me that this applies to all important questions. The minority prescribes the conditions and the majority must submit.

Mr. SPENCER and Mr. HARRISON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield first to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. I merely wish to call attention, through the courtesy of the Senator from Michigan, to the fact that the report was presented to the Senate on the 29th day of September, the last day but one of that month. The reason for the delay between September 29 and the date in November when, as the Senator from Nebraska rightly stated, it was taken up for consideration, was occasioned entirely by what seemed to be the exceeding importance of the revenue bill, which has occupied the time of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Michigan a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did the Senator from Michigan while the Democrats were in the majority contend for this sovereign and sacred right of the majority to govern this body?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have never denied it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did the Senator contend for it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I did not contend for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did the Senator offer a resolution for it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did the Senator speak for it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; no such proposition was before us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the Senator is a comparatively new convert, so far as activity is concerned, to this idea that the majority ought to govern.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not speaking for the Democratic Party—

Mr. WILLIAMS. I myself am an old convert to that idea.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do not argue further, please. I yielded only for a question. I never attempted to speak for the majority when that majority was Democratic. I do now speak as a majority member, being a Republican, and ask and insist that my party take steps—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. TOWNSEND. Just a moment. I am addressing the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I know it.

Mr. TOWNSEND (continuing). In order that my party may control the legislation for which it is responsible.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was not asking that question with a view of establishing partisan government in the Senate. I was asking it with a view of establishing majority government, whether it is partisan or not. Now, no matter what party is in power, Republican or Democratic, it has always seemed to me that a majority of the membership of the Senate ought to be able to take a vote, whether it was a majority composed of your party entirely, or a majority composed of my party entirely, or a majority composed of my party when my party was in the minority, plus a minority of your party, or a majority composed as now, I think, of the minority plus a minority of the present majority. In other words, majority rule in the Senate is one thing; partisan rule is another thing. The Senator never contended for that great and sacred principle hitherto.

Mr. HARRISON rose.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator from Mississippi wish to interrupt me?

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan if, on September 17, 1918, when the Democrats were in control of this body and a resolution to investigate the Newberry case was before the Senate, the Senator from Michigan did not then object to an investigation?

Mr. TOWNSEND. He did.

Mr. HARRISON. And was the cause of the delay, and this is the first time he has opened his mouth to try to expedite the matter.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan did strenuously object to a Democratic Senate investigating a Republican who had been elected to the succeeding Senate. I objected to an investigation by the Senate of the Sixty-fifth Congress of a Senator elected to the Sixty-sixth Congress. I insisted that the Sixty-sixth Congress was the judge of the qualification of its own members, and I have been ready to act upon this resolution at any time since the Committee on Privileges and Elections made its report.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have listened with much interest, as I always do, to the plea of confession and avoidance just put in by the Senator from Michigan. I have also, as it seems to me, though I may be wrong, listened to the swan song of the Republican Party as it came from his lips. I hear him saying that we ought not to allow one-third of the Senate to block a vote. Yet it seems to me that I could easily select one-third of the States of this Union who not only compose a majority of the people of the Union but pretty nearly a two-thirds majority of the people of the Union. I therefore have always clung to the idea that a two-thirds vote was necessary for cloture in this body—not in the other body, but in this body—because two-thirds of the States as represented here always compose a majority of the population of the United States; and anything less than two-thirds of this body, each man acting as an ambassador from his State and representing his State, might not be a majority of the entire people of the United States. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President, I notice that the Senator referred to the Newberry case as "the so-called Newberry case." Now, was not that a funny thing to say? Was not that rather a curlicue thing to say? That matter involves a question of the use of nearly $200,000 in a primary election. If it had occurred in Mississippi, where winning at a primary means winning the election, or in Alabama, or in Louisiana, or in Arkansas, I imagine you would not have confused your mind much about the difference between a primary and an election.

Not only is that true, but in three-fourths of the congressional districts of the Union the nomination means an election—I mean in three-fourths of the doubtful districts of the Union, comprising perhaps a majority in ordinary times. In those districts the nomination means the election. If we are going to establish the principle that while we can punish for corruption in a general election we can not punish for it in a primary, then, so far as most of the Cotton States are concerned, we have virtually said that no amount of corruption in the world has anything to do with the general election, because there is no general election there, inasmuch as there are no respectable white Republicans to amount to anything—oh, probably three or four or five hundred in the State of Mississippi and a few more in other States, and some of them very nice fellows, too, but generally radicals and fanatics upon political questions without the ordinary common hard sense that leads a man to know the difference between a nigger and a white man.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In just a moment I will yield. Down there, of course, everybody knows the difference. The niggers are Republicans and the white men are Democrats, and there are very few respectable, decent white men who belong to the Republican Party.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just one moment and I will yield. If that be true, and if it be furthermore true that this body has no right to inquire into a primary election, then this body has no right to question my nomination in Mississippi, because in five or six terms in the House and two terms in the Senate I have never had any opposition at a general election.

I now yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, when the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] presented the resolution for adjournment, I understood the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] to object to its present consideration and to suggest that under the rules of the Senate it must lie over for a day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I did not do that. I objected to its consideration until I concluded my remarks. I now withdraw any objection to the consideration of the resolution if the Senate desires to vote, and I know that a great majority of the Senate wish to vote on the resolution. I shall have to be content to vote against it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to point out the fact that the resolution, under the precedents of the Senate, does not have to lie over a day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not ask that it shall.

Mr. ROBINSON. Under the precedents of the Senate a resolution of this character may be considered immediately.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I had intended to make that point of order if the question was raised. I have looked up the precedents, and I know that what the Senator has said is correct. But I thought, inasmuch as the Senator from Michigan had made his speech, that it was well enough to let the Senator from Mississippi make his reply and then make the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not hear him.

Mr. CURTIS. I stated that I had intended as soon as the Senator from Mississippi concluded his remarks to call up the resolution to adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am perfectly willing to adjourn.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Mississippi, who has the floor, I wish to reply to a statement made by the Senator from Michigan. I think his address, coming at this time and under the circumstances, constitutes a very remarkable proceeding. I am perfectly aware of the fact that that may be a consideration to which the Senator from Michigan is entirely indifferent.

The Senator from Michigan has sarcastically referred to the delay that it is expected will result in the determination of the Newberry case and to the fact that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] desires to go to Haiti. The plain implication of his remark was that important business of the Senate was to await the convenience and pleasure of the Senator from Ohio. The Senate understands and the country must understand that the Senator from Ohio is going to Haiti on very important business of the Senate—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Appointed and commanded by the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. As a result of a resolution passed by the Senate of the United States. Other Democratic Senators and other Senators who are Republicans, a majority of the committee being Republicans, are directed by the Senate to proceed to Haiti on the business of the Senate and on the business of the United States. The Senator from Michigan has waited a long time before pressing consideration of the Newberry case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The "so-called" Newberry case.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Michigan has not been anxious until quite recently to have a vote on the Newberry case. The Senator from Ohio ought not to have to take the floor personally to respond to the sarcastic reference made to him and to his service in this case and in connection with the investigation of affairs in Haiti.

The Senator from Michigan began his address by declaring that the Republican Party in Congress had not accomplished anything. I am perfectly willing to agree with him on that proposition. I am in hearty accord with the Senator from Michigan when he says that the Republican Party have done so little—

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from Michigan did not say that the Republican Party had not accomplished anything, but he did say that they could have accomplished more.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Michigan said that so little had been done that he felt that we ought to continue in session, that we ought not to have any vacation, and he sarcastically referred to the fact that the motive for the resolution now under consideration is to enable Senators to obtain mileage.

Mr. President, who do you reckon would be the first Senator to draw mileage when the necessary resolution providing for it is passed? Do you suppose that the Senator from Michigan expects to decline to draw his mileage? During recent years the sessions of Congress have become almost continuous performances, with no intermission between the acts.

I said awhile ago that I was in a frame of mind to agree with the Senator from Michigan when he confessed that his party had accomplished very little during the present session of Congress, but I do not agree with him that it would benefit the country if the Congress shall remain in session until the hour of the meeting of the next session of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. Just a moment. The question of mileage is a question of appropriation. I respectfully suggest to my friend from Michigan that it is a very ill-considered allusion to suggest that Senators are willing to neglect the public business of the United States in order to increase their own compensation. I think the country would be better off, and that Congress would be better off, if we took a brief vacation. I think it would be well for Senators to go home and visit their people. I am not surprised that some Senators do not want to go home; but I believe if we occasionally get the viewpoint of the public and come back reinforced with the purpose to discharge our duties it will be much better.

The Senator from Michigan also said that some Senators have little regard for the Republican Party; some Senators, he said, who have no regard for the Republican Party have talked too much to suit him. I am not surprised at that statement either. When I consider the record that the Republican Party has made, I wonder how anybody could have regard for it. Take the present administration, take the acts of Congress during this session, and it is not amazing that the party is discredited even in the minds of some of its own members, some of its prominent representatives.

The Newberry case will be decided, and it will be decided with promptness. There is nothing in the circumstances surrounding this case, in my judgment, to warrant a Senator in reflecting upon another Senator who announces a purpose to go away in pursuit of the business of the Senate and who also desires to be present to vote on the Newberry case. It is a very extraordinary proceeding that the whole Senate shall be lectured by the Senator from Michigan because we are not willing to stay here and discuss his resolution on cloture.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. I was merely going to ask who had the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Mississippi wishes to resume the floor, I will desist.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; go ahead until you are through.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Michigan knows, and everybody else knows, that no cloture resolution is going to be seriously considered in the early future by the Senate of the United States. There has been nothing in the proceedings of the Senate in connection with the Newberry case that justifies a reference to the cloture question at this time.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. ROBINSON. I take pleasure in yielding to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question. I understood that the Senator from Mississippi had yielded to the Senator from Arkansas for a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; the Senator from Mississippi yielded to me to make a statement, and that is exactly what I am proceeding to do. I am not surprised that the Senator from Kansas does not feel an interest in the statement that I am making. I repeat, Mr. President, that there is nothing in the Newberry case or in the history of it, so far as it concerns the Senate, that justifies the Senator from Michigan in insisting that the Senate stay in session to consider that case.

Oh, we have had the cloture question raised in the Senate repeatedly during the last 20 years. Every Senator here knows the history of it; and we know that there is one thing Senators are not going to do—deprive themselves by their own act of the privilege of talking. What would happen to the Senate and to the country if the previous question were incorporated in the rules of the Senate? What would happen to my good friend the Senator from Michigan if there were denied him the privilege of unlimited debate, which means that in this body any Senator may take the floor at any time he can get it and talk as long as the Almighty will permit on any subject that he chooses and nobody can interfere with him? But beyond that is the fact that unlimited debate in the Senate has in many instances in the history of this country proven of inestimable value to the public and to the institutions of the Republic.

Mr. CURTIS. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Kansas offered a resolution providing for final adjournment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have concluded all that I desire to say on this subject.

Mr. CURTIS. Then, Mr. President, I move the adoption of the resolution which I have presented.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think I have the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator yielded, and I rose to a point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I still have the floor. I merely yielded temporarily to the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas will state his point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. The point of order is that the resolution I have offered is privileged and is in order at any time. The resolution was presented by me and was read by the Secretary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have been occupying the floor, and no man can take me off the floor for the next seven minutes during which I think I will occupy it. That is my answer to that. I will not yield to anybody else.

Mr. CURTIS. I insist on my point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. I offered the resolution which was read and which is privileged. It is in order at any time. It was in order when it was read and should have been put before the Senate at that time.

I call the attention of the Chair to the following precedent:

The Vice President (Mr. Hobart) laid before the Senate, for its consideration, a resolution of the House of Representatives providing for the final adjournment of the two Houses of Congress at 9 o'clock p. m. this day;

When,

Mr. Morgan objected to the consideration of the resolution and raised a point of order, namely, that objection having been made, the resolution, under clause 5, Rule XIV, must lie over one day for consideration.

The Vice President overruled the question of order and decided that the resolution which provided for an adjournment of Congress was a question of privilege, and that the provision of Rule XIV was not applicable thereto.

That precedent was adhered to at a later date when a similar resolution was submitted to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a point of order. Have I the floor or have I not? I thought I had, and I have not yielded to the Senator from Kansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas is stating a point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course he has a right to raise a point of order, even if the Senator from Mississippi has the floor, which the Chair is not now deciding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well, then, go ahead.

Mr. CURTIS. I have finished my statement on the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Kansas—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, then I will debate the point of order after the Senator from Kansas sits down.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that it is not debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood when the Senator from Kansas offered the resolution that he asked unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. The Chair, therefore, put that request to the Senate. There was objection at that time, and the Chair stated that there was objection. The Chair is of the opinion that unanimous consent is necessary that the point of order now raised by the Senator from Kansas is well taken, and that the resolution is before the Senate, is privileged, and not debatable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Chair also rule that the point of order is not debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has decided the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Chair rule, in spite of the Chair's decision that the point of order is not debatable, that there is no comeback from any Senator on this floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is not debatable unless the Chair permits and requests and desires debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes to conclude my observations on this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator will proceed for five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I began my observations by saying that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] had entered a plea of confession and avoidance. I did not dwell upon that, because I thought he was lawyer enough, and I know the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] was lawyer enough, to understand what I meant. The Senator from Michigan had confessed that the Republican Party had done nothing and he had charged us and the rules of the Senate in avoidance with the fault.

Mr. President, I want to go now to the point of which I was speaking when I surrendered the floor to my very dear friend, JOE ROBINSON, of Arkansas. I love JOE ROBINSON very much, and whenever I have a cake I am willing to give him at least half of it; but I hardly knew that JOE wanted three-fourths of it when he requested me to divide.

"The so-called Newberry case." That was the language of the Senator from Michigan. A Senator from his own State; a case affecting not only the honor of the States of the Union and of the American people but peculiarly affecting his own State; and he calls it "the so-called Newberry case"!

Mr. President, it may be "so called" as far as everybody in the world is concerned except the contestee, Mr. Newberry, but it will not be "so called" as far as he is concerned. Whether you vote by a party majority to keep him here or not, he has been disgraced and his political career has been closed. He will never dare run for another office, even in the State of Michigan; but if he does, the conscience of the State of Michigan will not imitate the quasi conscience of the United States Senate and send him back.

Mr. President, it does not require any technicalities; it does not require any lawyerlike ability. A plain, ordinary Mississippi red-neck; a plain, ordinary Georgia cracker; a plain, ordinary mechanic in Michigan, in Detroit, or anywhere else knows when a man spends nearly $200,000 in a primary election case that it was not spent honestly, that it was not spent legitimately, that it could not have been spent legally.

Somebody the other day in a slurring way—the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], I believe—said: "But in Mississippi a primary nomination amounts to an election." That is the very reason why I am insisting upon honesty in a primary. In some States and in some districts and in some of the mountain Republican districts of the South a primary nomination does amount to an election, and therefore a primary ought to be honest. You can meet the ordinary clothopper, without any great degree of legal learning, and tell him that a man spent $200,000, or very nearly that amount, in a primary, and he knows—he needs no proof—that that amount of money was not needed for any honest and legitimate purpose.

Oh, Mr. President, but it is said the contestee did not know anything about it. Poor, little, innocent female child, about 10 or 11 or 12 years old, I reckon. He did not even know he was running. According to the testimony he hardly knew he was running. His brother knew he was running, but his brother did not know how much money it was taking to run him, even out of his own private bank account and the bank accounts of the balance of the family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Mississippi has expired. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I present a memorandum for a unanimous-consent agreement respecting the Newberry case, and ask that it may be read to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that not later than the first calendar day after the Senate shall convene following January 1, 1922, the Senate will proceed with the consideration of Senate resolution 172, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan, etc., and upon any amendment or substitute that may then be pending or that may be offered thereto, and that it shall then be considered the unfinished business, and that not later than 1 o'clock p. m. on the third calendar day thereafter the Senate will proceed with such consideration to the exclusion of other business; and beginning with 1 o'clock on said third calendar day, and thereafter until the final vote, no Senator shall speak at any one time for a longer period than 30 minutes; provided, however, that any Senator shall have the right to speak upon said resolution, or amendments thereto, or substitute therefor, on any day after the reconvening of the Senate on December 5, subject to the above provisions.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not rise to object to the conclusion sought, except that the Senator should make exception as to certain matters that must have earlier attention. For instance, there is a very considerable appropriation bill that has passed the House to-day, or will pass to-day, which will be too late in its completion by the Senate committee in time to have it presented to the Senate and passed at this session, but which will be prepared and ought to be taken up immediately after we assemble in December, and certain other appropriation matters may seek early attention.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, there is nothing to prevent that at all. The resolution is only made the unfinished business beginning the first calendar day after we reconvene in January. The matters to which the Senator refers can be brought up in December. There will be nothing to interfere with that.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will permit me—

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The resolution, being one of the highest privilege, could be called up at any time by any Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. It could.

Mr. ROBINSON. And if any Senator chose to insist upon its consideration to the exclusion of appropriation bills, he would be able to do it anyway, without any unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. POMERENE. Probably that is so; and this recognizes the right of a Senator to speak on the Newberry case.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there can be no necessity for making the resolution the unfinished business, because any Senator at any time can bring it before the Senate by a proper motion, it being a matter of the highest privilege.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is true, except that we were trying to arrive at a definite time which might be satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator's proposition, but that does not carry with it that we must beforehand provide that it shall occupy, perhaps, months of debate.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no; there is no such intention.

Mr. WARREN. I do not, however, object to the proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in the first place, it is an impossibility to make anything the unfinished business by unanimous consent, but that is a technical objection which I do not care to make.

My objection to this proposition is, as I stated once before, to putting it off so long, and in the meantime making it possible to bring it up and put it off every day from now until January. Instead of expediting this matter, I believe it will have the contrary effect to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement that will make it possible for any Senator to bring up the resolution at any time between now and January and then lay it aside and take up something else. It seems to me it is not an intelligent way to consider this question.

I should be very glad indeed to see an agreement made by which the time for which any Senator could speak should be limited. Personally, I do not want to delay the matter. I think this proposed agreement has a tendency to delay it. It ought to be disposed of long before next January, and for that reason, Mr. President, I object.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, before the Senator makes his objection, will he consider, perhaps, this point in the case? I agree with him that the resolution ought to be speedily determined, and yet two things are undoubtedly true. One of them, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has so clearly stated, is that whether the Senator likes it or not, the question is one of such high privilege that any Senator can bring it up at any time. That is because of its high privilege, and nothing that we can do can prevent that right. The time named in January is long. It is too long under any ordinary condition of affairs; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the leader of the minority opinion and others will be out of the country on Government business until the latter part of December, and that is the reason that makes me quite willing to consent to this unanimous-consent agreement, to which otherwise I would not want to consent. We could bring it up in the first part of the next session and probably dispose of it then; but the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and other Senators are to be away on Government business and will not be back until the latter part of December. Therefore the early part of January seems to be the earliest time at which the matter can be fairly set down by the consent of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not want to interfere with the convenience of the Senators who want to go to Haiti, or with the convenience of any other Senator, if it will result in any inconvenience to them; but I am not going to consent to any unanimous-consent agreement that sets this resolution or any other resolution before the Senate in such a way that it can come in and go out for two or three months' time. If Senators want to lay aside the Newberry matter after it has been debated as long as it ought to have been debated, it seems to me, and go on to other business, and take it up at some future time, of course, I am not in position to object to it; but here is a proposition that practically lays it before the Senate now, takes it out to-morrow, and brings it in the next day, depending on when any Senator wants to debate it, and we can not vote on it until next year.

I am objecting to fixing a time now. In the first place, I think the right way to reach this, though perhaps it could not be done now, because there may be some Senators who want to make a longer speech, would be to agree to take it up at some time next January, if Senators want to do that, and let us take up other business in the meantime, so that we can do something, and then limit the time for debate. I do not care particularly about having it taken up in December, when we reassemble, as it seems that many Senators who desire to be here when a vote is taken will be absent then, but we would be establishing a precedent by this unanimous-consent agreement, which it seems to me would make the Senate ridiculous for perhaps two months.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very deeply interested in the interpretation that is to be put upon this consent agreement, because it is my hope that on the first day of the next session the Senate will proceed to the consideration of what is known as the railroad bill, and when the agreement was first presented to me I objected to it because it attempted to make the Newberry case the unfinished business after the 6th of December. As I understand the agreement, however, the Newberry case will not come before the Senate for any possible action until the first calendar day upon which the Senate is in session after the 1st of January, and it then becomes the unfinished business, and must be continued to the exclusion of all other business until a vote is had.

The final proviso in the unanimous-consent agreement, as I look at it, is of no consequence at all, and therefore I did not object to it, because it is the privilege of any Senator, no matter what question may be pending, to address the Senate on any subject he may desire to speak upon. I think the agreement would be in better form if the proviso were eliminated; but I care nothing about it, because I know that if, for instance, the railroad bill is before the Senate any Senator can speak upon the Newberry case without violating any of our rules of order.

So I think it really means what the Senator from Nebraska wants the agreement to provide, namely, that this case shall come before the Senate immediately after the 1st of January and be continued to the exclusion of all other business until it is disposed of.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Iowa, I think, is in error in this respect: If the railroad bill comes before the Senate, and some Senator wants to have the Newberry case brought up, under this unanimous-consent agreement he can have the railroad bill laid aside and the Newberry resolution laid before the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. He will have no right to have the railroad bill laid aside, under this agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand he will; but he will have no right to have a vote. It looks foolish, it seems to me. Why make any different rule in regard to this resolution from what we make in regard to any other resolution? You can not make a proposition the unfinished business in this body by a unanimous-consent agreement. The status of a measure as the unfinished business comes about as a result of certain action of the Senate, and to state now that the Newberry resolution can come up at any time, that any Senator can have it laid before the Senate and debate it, but that we can not have a vote on it, it seems to me, will result only in waste of time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let me suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that I agree with him in regard to the attempt to state a conclusion with regard to the unfinished business, but the agreement provides that at 1 o'clock on a certain day the Newberry resolution shall be laid before the Senate, and that then the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of that measure exclusively until a vote is had, and it is that part of the agreement which will make it the unfinished business.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio, who presented the request for unanimous consent, that he strike from the request that portion of it which makes the resolution the unfinished business. I have already presented to the Senate my views on the effect of it.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he ask unanimous consent that at a certain time—I do not care when he fixes it—the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Newberry resolution, and that it will consider it, except when other business is taken up by unanimous consent, until it is finally concluded. I do not think the Senator ought to fix a time for debate unless he will include in it a limitation on the length of time Senators may speak. Let the agreement provide that at a certain time we will proceed to the consideration of the resolution, as we do with everything else, and within a day or so after the debate has proceeded we will reach some kind of an agreement as to a day for a vote. The Senate has often entered into an agreement that at a certain time we would proceed to vote, and within a couple of days of the time for the vote a few Senators, talking two or three hours apiece, consume all the time, and other Senators are deprived of any right to speak at all in a body that ordinarily has unlimited debate. I would be perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to have the speeches limited to 10 minutes, but I realize that that would be unfair to some Senators who have made preparations for extensive speeches. I suggest, therefore, that no limitation be fixed until the debate has proceeded.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Is the Senator objecting to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement in its present form?

Mr. NORRIS. I did object.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator object to it if the latter portion of it be stricken out?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know how it would read then.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Let us have it stated, in order that we may determine this question.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the matter may go over until to-morrow. The request can be changed in the meantime. I am sure that we would have some trouble in getting it in shape to-night, and we want to have an executive session.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Let it go over.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator permit me? I address myself particularly to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I do not think that even he, though he has been diligent in his attendance on the Senate, is familiar with the efforts which have been made by Senators on one side and the other side to reach an agreement as to a time when this matter could come to a possible conclusion. The Senator from Missouri has written perhaps two agreements—

Mr. SPENCER. More than that.

Mr. POMERENE. He has written a number of agreements. I have tried to arrange two or three, and other Senators have tried to arrange others. There were different views which had to be met, and I had the agreement in a form which met the approval of all I was able to consult. I did not see the Senator from Nebraska this afternoon; otherwise I certainly would have obtained his views. There is not any desire to take any snap judgment or anything of that kind, but we hoped to arrive at an agreement which we thought would be mutually acceptable. However, I think it is well, perhaps, to let it go over until to-morrow morning.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 50 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, November 23, 1921, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, November 22, 1921.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, when there is no eye to pity and no arm to save, then the Lord will take us up. Oh, it is Thy eternal love which is under the burden and the soul of things. We beseech Thee to forgive us our trespasses and unfold the best qualities of our manhood. In a very high sense make our lives intelligible, our labors divine, our sorrows sacramental, and our souls mighty. Oh, be melody for the dirge, sweetness for the cup, and strength for all human frailty. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. WALSH, to act as Speaker to-morrow, Wednesday, November 23, 1921, and the next two succeeding days, if there should be any in this session, and asks that the designation be approved by the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will notify the President and the Senate.

BRIDGE ACROSS ROCK RIVER, ILL.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 8346, granting the consent of Congress to the board of supervisors of Whiteside County, Ill., to construct a bridge across Rock River. The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 8346, a bridge bill. Is there objection? Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill has been reported from the committee?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; it has been reported unanimously by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and has the approval of the War Department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the board of supervisors of Whiteside County, in the State of Illinois, and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Rock River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of Sterling, in the county of Whiteside, in the State of Illinois, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this is an ordinary bridge bill. There is an existing bridge at this place over Rock River, a public highway bridge, a free bridge, and this is simply a permit for the reconstruction of that bridge.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER OF THE NORTH AT FARGO, N. DAK.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8744) granting the consent of Congress to the State of North Dakota, the county of Cass and the city of Fargo, N. Dak., and the State of Minnesota, the county of Clay and the city of Moorhead, Minn., or any of them, and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River of the North at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between the cities of Fargo, N. Dak., and Moorhead, Minn., which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill is on the calendar?

Mr. BURTNESS. This bill is on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, properly, and has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and has the approval of the War Department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of North Dakota, the county of Cass and the city of Fargo, N. Dak., and the State of Minnesota, the county of Clay and the city of Moorhead, Minn., or any of them, and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River of the North at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between the cities of Fargo, N. Dak., and Moorhead, Minn., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Amend the title so as to read:

"A bill granting the consent of Congress to the State of North Dakota, the county of Cass and the city of Fargo, N. Dak., and the State of Minnesota, the county of Clay and the city of Moorhead, Minn., or any of them, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North between the cities of Fargo, N. Dak., and Moorhead, Minn."

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, an additional bridge is required at this point, due to the fact that one of the main transcontinental highways of the country passes over the river at this point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting the consent of Congress to the State of North Dakota, the county of Cass and the city of Fargo, N. Dak., and the State of Minnesota, the county of Clay and the city of Moorhead, Minn., or any of them, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North between the cities of Fargo, N. Dak., and Moorhead, Minn."

On motion of Mr. BURTNESS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SETTLEMENT OF MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I ask that Senate bill 843, to amend section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," as amended by the House, with a Senate amendment thereto, be taken from the Speaker's table, and move that the House concur in the Senate amendment to the House amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks that the Senate bill 843 be laid before the House, and moves that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate to the House amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under reservation of the point of order, I desire to have the Senate amendment to the House amendment read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was about to direct the reading of the Senate amendment.

The Clerk reported the Senate amendment to the House amendment.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the Senate amendment includes the language against which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] urged the point of order, which was sustained by the chairman of the committee [Mr. FESS], on Wednesday last. With the House concurring in the Senate amendment, it means the passage of the bill exactly in the form in which it passed the House with these words stricken out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman quite correct in his statement that the amendment conforms to the objection which I raised when the bill was under consideration? Does not this amendment have the effect of not having any limitation upon the authorization of the amount of money that may be paid for these claims, but enables the money to be appropriated ad libitum, according to the presentation of the claims?

Mr. RHODES. In response to the gentleman's question I wish to say that if this language goes out of the bill it means that the question of expenditure of money will be governed by the original act, which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make awards and pay the same out of the $8,500,000 heretofore appropriated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; with the adoption of this amendment there is no restriction as to the amount of the claims that may be determined and passed on by the Secretary of the Interior.

This amendment carries out just what I prophesied would be carried out, that if the $18,000,000 of claims were presented and found to be valid the Congress would have to appropriate the money regardless of whether there was a balance in the $8,500,000 fund or not.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. In just a moment. I think that statement might be true if the gentleman's assumption was correct, but to my mind it is a very remote possibility, and the fact is, when this language goes out, then the objections raised by the gentleman on last Wednesday, which he now enlarges upon, will have been met; and in the light of the gentleman's position, with which I did not agree, and in the light of the decisions of Chairman Fess, I think this language ought to go out. And then the law will simply stand for future administration as it has stood in the past as to the payment of awards. Awards will be paid out of the sums heretofore authorized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; not out of the sums authorized.

Mr. RHODES. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I assert with a fair knowledge of the facts and the law that what I say is true, with all due regard to the gentleman's opinion, and insist he is not justified in making that statement, because the original law only authorizes a maximum expenditure of $8,500,000. Now, I would like to know on what ground the gentleman stands here and insists that a sum in excess of that amount might be authorized?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. RHODES. It can not be authorized under the terms of this act. It is not authorized under the terms of the original act, and could only be authorized by future action of Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has directed the question to me—

Mr. RHODES (continuing). And must relate to the unexpended balance.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman asked me a question. Will he give me an opportunity to reply just briefly?

Mr. RHODES. I certainly shall be glad to do so. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentleman five minutes, if he desires.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will not need that much time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RHODES. But I do not want to yield the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; I do not wish to take the control of the floor away from the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, under the amendment that was adopted by the House we changed radically the basis for the determination of these claims. Under the original bill, as the hearings and the decision of the Solicitor of the Interior Department and the Attorney General show, it was necessary, in order to have these claims paid, that they should be something more than prospectors' claims, and that it had to be shown that it was a workable industrial proposition. If you would examine the report of the prospectors' claims that have been rejected, it will be seen that they amount to $18,000,000 entire. Now, I have called the attention of the House to the fact that we are changing entirely the basis of calculation. We are opening up under this new amendment that was adopted by the House a policy to require every person who went out in the field and prospected, whether it was a commercial proposition or not—and I say that without fear of contradiction, notwithstanding the letter of the Secretary of the Interior as printed in the report—

Mr. COLTON. Does the gentleman understand that claims that are not already filed, that is, were not filed prior to June 2, 1919, could be considered?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; except to those claims amounting to nearly three-quarters of a million or more, offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON]. The document, which I have studied and which I presented, will show the amount that had been rejected. Now, you are opening it up anew.

I know when I am beaten. I made my fight, presented my case to the attention of the House, and I was beaten, and I am only calling attention in this eleventh hour, to what will be purposed in this amendment, the opening up of the Treasury to all these claims, which I regard as entirely specious and without merit under the original intentment of the law.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. RHODES. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, no man in this House does more good work than the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and I only wish there were more like him. Of course, men who are earnest, as he is, in their desire to guard the Treasury, sometimes are led to take extreme positions in their zeal, and I am afraid the gentleman in his commendable zeal in the public interest has in this case taken a position that is hardly tenable.

The bill as originally presented to the House merely broadened somewhat the class of claims that could be considered. As a matter of fact, it did not broaden, in my opinion, the original intent of the Congress. It broadened the intent of the Congress as that intent had been interpreted by the commission in the Secretary's office that had acted upon these claims and what the House did was to merely express clearly what I understood and what I think most of us understood was the intent of the Congress in passing the original bill. In doing that no additional funds were made available. The only funds that could be utilized were funds that had already been appropriated. Unhappily the bill as originally drawn contained a provision to the effect that there is "hereby appropriated" to pay the claims that might be adjudicated under the amended bill the sums necessary for that purpose out of the appropriation heretofore made—an altogether unnecessary provision. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], acting under the rules of the House and according to the rules of the House, very properly made a point of order that that was in effect an appropriation. To meet that point of order an amendment was offered and adopted simply authorizing an appropriation. Now, the fact is that no reference to appropriations was necessary or should have been in the bill at any time. What the Senate has done is to place the bill in the form in which it should have been originally, eliminating all references to an appropriation. There is no necessity for any such reference. I think we ought to adopt the Senate amendment.

Mr. DOWELL. Under the precedent that is now before the House can claims be allowed in excess of the appropriations that have already been made for that purpose?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all. That could not have been done, either under the House bill or the House bill as amended by the Senate amendment.

The virtue of the Senate amendment is that it strikes out all reference to appropriations and leaves the bill what it was originally intended to be—a measure more clearly stating what was, in my opinion and in the opinion of most of those who have studied the matter, the original intent of the Congress touching these claims. There can not be a dollar paid or a dollar obligated beyond the sum already available, and in my opinion there will be a comparatively small number of claims added to those already presented in consequence of this amendment. I do not anticipate that the amendment of to-day will very largely increase the Government expenditure. It will enable a number of claimants of comparatively small means who went to considerable expense, for them, in the endeavor to meet the demand and need of the Nation for those war metals to receive equitable treatment. Under the narrow construction formerly placed on the bill, those people, mostly people of very moderate means—prospectors and small individual operators—were entirely barred from any participation in the relief contemplated. This bill, it seems to me, performs a simple act of justice in behalf of these people—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. MONDELL. This simply performs an act of justice in behalf of people of small or moderate means who have suffered losses in the production of war material and lays no additional obligation on the Treasury.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I believe in view of some things that have been said that there should be a restatement or repetition of the purposes of Congress in enacting this law, and remind you of the two major purposes we had in mind.

Mr. CHALMERS. Before the gentleman goes into that I wish to say that the reason I think this is a bad bill and was objectionable is the fact that it reopens those 600 or more claims that have already been settled and rejected.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; some have based their objection on that fact, but most of the opposition has been based on a misunderstanding as to how much further we went. I have always prided myself on being frank with the House. What was the intention of the House when it provided for a settlement of these losses by an amendment to the informal war contracts bill that authorized the War Department to settle war contracts? Section 5 was inserted to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle the losses of people who had responded to requests of the four Government bureaus to produce four kinds of necessary war materials that could not be profitably produced in peace time in this country, but which we import. At that time we needed the tonnage and the ships to carry supplies and troops to Europe, and they could not be used as formerly to transport these metals from foreign countries, and we had to make it possible for men to meet the demands here at home in developing unprofitable deposits necessary to carry on the war. It was not a good business venture to undertake it.

Now, we authorized the Secretary to make an equitable settlement of these losses. Secretary Lane was a very busy man, and he appointed a commission to make the settlements. Complaints were made against the awards of the commission. The Committee on Mines and Mining went into this matter and fully inquired into it. If you will take the report of the late Representative Garland, who was then chairman of the committee and who has since died, you will find that the committee unanimously agreed that that commission, which was acting for the Secretary in the settlement of these claims, wholly misinterpreted the intent of Congress and misapplied the facts. Now, we reached the conclusion that the disposal of these claims by the commission would not settle the claims, because it was admitted that they had not been given in a great many instances due consideration. We knew that in a great many cases where they had been arbitrarily considered, as a practical fact real consideration had been denied. It was admitted that errors were made not only in miscalculations but mathematical errors. So the matter came before our committee, and there was first reported from the committee a bill to authorize a review by the Court of Claims. It was objected that that process was too long, considering the condition and situation of these claimants.

It was suggested that we authorize the Secretary of the Interior to review these rulings that had been made by the commissioner, or, in other words, grant a new trial. We found that a section of the bill as it came from the Senate granted a new trial on the proof already submitted. I objected to that because in many instances the proof on file consisted of only ex parte statements of claimants. I objected to this as it would be unfair to the Government, so we worded the House amendment so that it will be possible when the Secretary reopens a case to present proof on the part of the Government. We changed it in that respect, and we also changed the provisions with reference to the appropriation. That should never have been in the bill.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. Will my colleague state what was the intent and purpose of the committee in putting that in the bill?

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman mean the language about the appropriation?

Mr. RHODES. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman will recall that I said it was wholly unnecessary, because Congress has already made available for payment of awards $8,500,000. I have in my possession a statement which can be made available to gentlemen if they desire to see it—a statement showing the claims passed upon, which are the cream of the claims. They allowed an average of only 30 per cent. Those claims must have been filed within 90 days after the passage of the original act or else a formal notice of an individual to file must have been given within that time. If they should find even on these claims, which I think they will not, the same basis of losses that they have found on the cream of the claims—that is, the 30 per cent—you will still have between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 to cover into the Treasury. The appropriation feature never should have been mentioned, because Congress has already made the appropriation. We appropriated $8,500,000. That is the limit that can be paid out without additional appropriation.

Now, the main original purpose we had in mind was to grant a review or retrial of these claims where it is contended that they had not received proper consideration and a just and equitable settlement as provided by the original act. We wanted the future to be so clear that whenever these private claimants came to Congress and asked their Congressmen to file private claim bills, we could with justice say, "No; we gave you a fair day in court, and your claim was fully looked into and rejected." But the findings of that old commission—and the unanimous opinion of our committee was that that old commission had misinterpreted the intent of Congress—were such that we would not be in a position to say that if they attempted to bring up those claims in the future, and so we proposed in order to have an adjudication that will command respect that the new Secretary of the Interior, in whom we had full confidence as to his conservatism and sense of fairness, should reopen these claims and grant a retrial and a review and see if there was anything in the contention of these people that they had not received a proper adjustment of their claims.

Now, if any Member does not agree that was our main purpose, I would like to know it. No one challenges that fact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. WINGO. Then, in addition to that, what did we do? We brought forward in the amendment that we made to section 5 not only the old provisions so as to insure a retrial as suggested, but we also extended it to some extent, and candor compels me to say that I was opposed to at least one of those extensions and thought we ought to be content to provide for retrial and new and additional awards to meet the erroneous ruling of the comptroller, and error on mail filings, and miscalculation, and mathematical errors, but I was overruled and the claims based on published demands were added.

Now the amount, with the claims that are already filed and to which this restricted act applies, can not be as much as some gentlemen seem to think. There is no ground for the fear a great many have had.

Next, it covers cases where there has been either a recognized miscalculation or where there was a mathematical error admitted. Then we come to another major purpose of the committee, which is accomplished by this bill, first to grant the right of review by the new Secretary of the Interior, so that men may have their day in court.

And second, it meets the ruling of the comptroller where he misinterpreted the plain intent of the original act which said "payment or payments," and where they issued a second check where they discovered an error, or where they made an additional award, and the comptroller ruled that they had no authority to do that.

So Congress has two major purposes; not to open up the floodgates, but first, where it is alleged and where the Secretary finds that there is good ground to believe that justice has been denied; second, it meets the erroneous ruling of the comptroller, and third, not to cover new cases that have been added, but where it has been broadened, and that does not go very far.

I will wind up with this statement, that if they go as far as they did before, and allow 30 per cent of the claims, there will then be at least $2,000,000 covered back into the Treasury.

But, of course, we must do justice. It is conceded that where a miscalculation was made, as in one case where the commission tried to apply a 56 per cent arbitrary rule of stimulation, and by miscalculation applied this percentage, not to all items but to the items left after eliminating certain disputed items; and then I understand in one case, I do not know what case it was, a mathematical error was committed. The 56 per cent miscalculation was in the Pratt case.

Mr. CONNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CONNELL. As I understand, this bill does not appropriate any new money?

Mr. WINGO. If we adopt the amendment of the Senate, it leaves this bill not making any reference whatever to appropriations. It just leaves the law as it is in that respect, as the unexpended balance is already available and another appropriation is not necessary.

Mr. CONNELL. And merely gives a review in court.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; it will grant a review by the present Secretary and compel the comptroller to pay additional awards that in some cases have already been made, and such awards as the Secretary may make on a review. I think Secretary Fall can be trusted to protect the Treasury under the restrictions that the original act and this act contain, and at the same time, by review or retrial, give claimants a "day in court," correct former erroneous rulings, miscalculations, and technical actions, and make a "just and equitable" settlement of net losses, as Congress originally intended.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, on the pending motion I move the previous question.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. RHODES. I withhold my motion and yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] three minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, like the gentleman from Wisconsin, I was and am opposed to this legislation; but, like him, I recognize that we have been defeated and that the legislation has passed and will pass with this amendment, and so I will not oppose the amendment. I believe, however, that we ought to know just what the amendment does. I want to read the language of the author of the amendment in another body, in which he states what its purpose is. Speaking of the language which was stricken out, he says:

If it should remain in the bill, it would have the effect of returning to the Treasury the appropriation which has already been made, requiring it to be again taken out by another appropriation. Then the whole matter of the allowance of these claims and the satisfaction of these meritorious services on the part of producers of these essential war minerals would have to be fought over again in the effort to pass through Congress another bill appropriating the money for their satisfaction, though the funds have already been appropriated as the law now stands.

So, striking out the language which Senator POINDEXTER erroneously understood to have been put in by opponents of the bill makes at least the existing appropriation available for this purpose.

Now, as to the other point: If the fears of some of us are realized—and I hope they will not be realized—if the claim allowed under this general review of the acts of the former Secretary by the present Secretary, and if they amount to more than the $8,000,000 plus heretofore appropriated, of course they can not be paid until the further action of Congress. But if we should pay over $8,000,000 of these claims now appropriated for and there remain $2,000,000 or $5,000,000 or $8,000,000 more allowed, it will certainly be very difficult for Congress to refuse to make the further appropriation when the question comes before us.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri moves the previous question on the motion to concur in the Senate amendment to the House amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the Senate amendment to the House amendment to the Senate bill.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. RHODES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House concurred in the Senate amendment was laid on the table.

PAYMENT OF NOVEMBER SALARIES.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read H. J. Res. 225, authorizing payment of the salaries of the officers and employees of Congress for November, 1921, on the 23d day of said month, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives are authorized and directed to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, borne on the annual and session rolls, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the full month of November, 1921, on the 23d day of said month. Such amount as may be necessary to pay the session employees from the date of the adjournment of the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress until the beginning of the second session thereof, is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think perhaps it might be wise for the gentleman to explain the provision with reference to the session employees.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution departs slightly from the ordinary resolution presented on occasions like this. Session employees are not usually paid during a recess or vacation or adjournment period, but it was thought that inasmuch as there are only 10 days between the time of the adjournment and the time of reconvening, it would not be quite fair to those employees to deprive them of their pay, and hence this resolution covers them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1922.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations for deficiencies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering H. R. 9237, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. And pending that, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if we can not agree on time for general debate and the division of that time. I suggest that three hours will probably be as much time as we ought to consume, and I would prefer to have it less.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman that I have had several requests for time, but I am not at all certain that it will all be asked for when the time comes. I think, however, that an hour and a half would be as little time as we can get along with on this side, and it is really not enough if all the gentlemen that have asked for time claim it.

Mr. MADDEN. I am anxious that the bill should be passed to-day, and I would concede a greater time for general debate if we had more time. I hope that the gentleman will agree to three hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee and the other half by myself.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will make no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to three hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and one half by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. MADDEN was agreed to; accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BURTON in the chair.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, in presenting this bill we have endeavored to the extent of our ability to present one for as small an amount as will permit the departments of the Government properly to function. The estimates presented by the budget officer to the President amounted to $190,534,653.22. The recommendations of the committee aggregate $103,698,221.77. The deductions amount to $86,836,431.45. There have been deducted from the estimates for the Veterans' Bureau $56,000,000 of the $86,000,000; $27,400,000 have been deducted from the estimate submitted by the Navy Department—the entire amount; $3,436,431.35 have been deducted from the miscellaneous items recommended for the consideration of the committee.

In what I shall have to say I shall not undertake to treat of all the questions involved in the bill. I shall endeavor to confine what I have to say to three major subjects. One involves the appropriation suggested for the Post Office Department, another the Treasury Department, and the third the Veterans' Bureau.

The Post Office Department has been allowed by the Committee on Appropriations, which allowance is now up to you for consideration, $6,525,000. We refused $359,000 in one item which the Post Office Department urgently requested. That was for the increased demands for the operation of the air mail service. The present air mail service appropriation amounts to $1,250,000 for the conduct of the air mail service between New York and San Francisco. The request for $350,000 more was made and was refused. We refused it because we believe that we are paying out all the money that should be paid for this activity, as the mail carried by air pays no postage whatever.

Why do I say that? For this reason: At 8.45 every night a train leaves New York with all the mail intended for transportation to the West. No mail is sent by air from New York except mail that comes into the post office after 8.45 at night. At 7 o'clock every morning the air mail leaves New York with such mail for the West as came into the post office during the night.

It overtakes the train at Cleveland that left the night before. It places on the train at Cleveland the mail it brought from New York and takes an equal amount off the train at Cleveland and proceeds to Chicago. There it transfers the mail it took on at Cleveland and takes an equal amount of mail from that train to Omaha, and places that mail on the train at Omaha and takes an equal amount from that train and proceeds to Salt Lake City, where it does the same thing. It takes an equal amount from that train and carries it to San Francisco.

So we pay the railroad companies for the transportation of all the mail that is carried by airplane. We only advance about 16,000 letters for delivery at San Francisco. The cost of transporting the mail by air is admitted by the postal authorities to be $5.35 a ton-mile. The cost of transporting mail by train averages a little less than 9 cents a ton-mile; but let us say it is 9 cents. Divide $5.35 by 9 and you find that the cost of transporting the mail by air is sixty times more than by rail. There is very little advantage in the advancement of the mail and, as I have pointed out, we receive no compensation whatever for the mail we carry by air. The present cost of transporting mail by rail is $96,000,000 a year. If we carried it all by air, it would cost sixty times $96,000,000, or $5,800,000,000. If we were to pay $5,800,000,000 for the transportation of the mails of the United States, you will see how much cooperation you would have from the people. Those who are demanding air-mail service to-day under these circumstances would be the first to object. Therefore we did not allow the $350,000 asked for. The question then was, What can they do without it? It is a commercial experiment, as the Post Office Department says. The work is being done for the purpose of giving encouragement to the commercial development of air service. The question is, Can we experiment sufficiently without operating every day? They say they can not operate a daily route unless they get this money. We believe that they can experiment just as successfully if they operate every other day as they can by operating every day; but it is up to the House to say whether they wish to put the $350,000 into the bill or not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will refrain and the House will be kind enough to permit me to proceed without interruption, I think it would be better to have me make a consecutive statement—I think I shall make all of the points much more clear—and if at the end of 30 minutes, say, any gentleman in the House wishes to ask any questions, I shall be glad to answer them. At present I think it will make for better order and more intelligent consideration of the problems presented, and a better presentation to the House of the questions involved, if I be permitted to proceed without interruption.

We have included in the bill an item of $1,200,000, on account of the Postal Service, to pay losses for insured and registered mail. That may seem a large amount; but the receipts from this source are $16,000,000 a year and the cost, including the $1,200,000, will be but $5,200,000, so this is a profitable enterprise.

We have an item of $999,000 in this section of the bill for deficiencies in special-delivery service in 1921. That indicates that there were $999,000 worth of work done in special-delivery letter cases more than the appropriation provided for, and the audit only disclosed this condition a year after the activity ceased.

The Treasury Department came before your committee with a request for $2,630,000 to employ additional men to audit and investigate tax returns. They told the committee that with $2,630,000 they could employ a force of experts in the office here and in the field to audit the corporation returns, which have not been audited since 1917, and which should be audited in order to get whatever money may be due from them.

They say that some subsidiary corporations have schedules so large that it takes a wagon to carry them, and that no auditor could audit more than 15 of these claims in a year. They say that from the audit already made under the appropriation given them of $8,000,000 last year they have been able to collect as the result of the work of the auditors in the office here, in back taxes, $113,600,000 a year. They have been able to collect from the work of the field men that they were authorized to employ $244,000,000 a year in back taxes, making $357,600,000 a year; and they say that if we give them the means by which they can employ additional auditors to audit these corporation schedules, they would be able to bring to the Treasury $200,000,000 additional a year. In the consideration of the request they made for $2,630,000 the committee found that they were asking for more than the committee believed would do the work, and we have reduced the sum which they asked by $838,000 and recommend an appropriation for this activity of $1,792,000.

In the collection of $10,000,000,000 of taxes many mistakes must be made, many mistakes have been made. Some have been made against the men who pay the taxes and some in their favor, but out of all of the mistakes it is found that there is due a very large amount of money that ought to be refunded to the taxpayers. The Treasury Department has no money with which to make these refunds. Much embarrassment has existed all over the country among citizens because of their inability to collect the overpayments which they made. The committee, therefore, brings to you for your consideration a proposal to appropriate $23,057,000 for the payment of refunds of illegally collected taxes. I think the people of the United States will be very glad to know that this appropriation is made, because demand after demand from every quarter of the Nation is constantly coming for these refunds, and inquiries are being made every day as to why it takes so long for the Government to pay back money which it has collected illegally. Therefore, we come to you with this recommendation.

The important matter in connection with which we come is the Veterans' Bureau. That is the one subject which every man and woman in America is especially interested. The men who fought to preserve America's freedom who were wounded in the service of their country or contracted disease as a result of that service are the special charges of the Nation. They are entitled to every consideration which a grateful Nation can bestow. They are entitled to it because of the patriotic service which they rendered and sacrifices which they made. I do not believe there is a man anywhere in America who would not make any sacrifice to see that these men, as the wards of the Nation, are properly provided for. For one I want these men to know that my heart goes out to them, and to the extent that I can see that justice is done them I shall devote my life and make any sacrifice, and I believe that is the attitude of every Member of the House and every Member of the Senate. [Applause.]

In saying this in advance of what I am going to say in criticism, I think it is only fair to say also that while I am about to criticize the administration of the vocational training section particularly and the hospital section of the Veterans' Bureau, I want it understood that this was a very large undertaking. It came to those who were placed in charge as a new responsibility; they had no experience; they could not foresee what they might be called upon to do. They had no preparation made to meet these emergencies. They made many mistakes. They perhaps could not avoid making these mistakes, but they have been in the service long enough now to have gained experience by practice, and the one thing that we ought to learn to do is to manage every section of this great business enterprise with economy, with fairness to the men, with justice to the Treasury and to the taxpayers. [Applause.]

We have to-day 90,000 men in training. Four hundred and forty thousand men have been registered as eligible for training. That does not mean that they have been passed by the doctors as eligible, but that they have made application. These men will not be able to go into training at a very early date. Two hundred and eighty-five thousand of the 440,000 have really been passed upon as eligible. One hundred and twenty-eight thousand men at one time and another since the war closed have been put into vocational training, but only 6,000 of the 128,000 have come out. Nobody knows what became of the rest, except that 3,000 died, and 17,000 were found unfit for the training into which they went. The trouble with the management was that a man would go into training, say, as a blacksmith, or as a doctor, or as a lawyer. After he was in for a short time he would be transferred to something else and something else, and as many as 10 transfers of occupational training have been made, so that men did not know where they were, what they were, or where they were going, whether they were going to do one thing or another, and a very large amount of money has been wasted in endeavoring to find out what kind of training should be granted.

We have 99,000 men in training. I said 90,000, meaning 90,000 men in training who are being paid while being trained. The other 9,000 are not in the class that is entitled to compensation while training is being given.

The average cost per man per month who is in training is $126, and $157,000,000 so far has been expended for training purposes, and $121,000,000 of this has been paid to the men in allowances, and $36,000,000 paid for overhead, which is outrageous. Out of every $99 paid to a man in training it costs $10.68 for administration. That seems outrageous. The operation is very simple. And $16.32 is allowed only for teaching, equipment, and all other expenses. Now, if it costs $10.68 to make an allowance of $99, where the operation of making the allowance is very simple, there must be something wrong with the management. They have expert bureau psychiatrists, expert dentists, expert oculists, expert everything, with no note taken of the cost.

This was told me by one of the officials. It is not in the record of the hearings. This official was connected with the bureau. A man who was unfortunate enough to have lost his leg during the war and was now able to walk around on an artificial leg, and, not having experience as to how to wear one, not as much experience as I have had, was unable to tell what to do when the strap broke on his leg. So he went to one of these headquarters to get a strap. They said, "Well, you must have your eyes examined." He said, "There is nothing the matter with my eyes." "But you have got to go through this routine of getting your eyes examined. That is part of the work." There was nothing the matter with his eyes; he said, "What I want is a strap for my artificial leg." "But your eyes must be examined." He asked, "What has that to do with a strap?" He said, "When I got through with the eye examination, they said that I must go into the dentist's in order to have my teeth examined. I told them my teeth were perfect, but that I wanted this strap for my artificial leg." They made him take the examination for his teeth in the dental clinic. When he was through with that they sent him to a place where he could get the strap, a very simple process. But in the meantime he had gone through these two examinations. What was the result of the examination? There was nothing the matter with the man's eyes, nothing the matter with his teeth, but there must be somebody paid to make the examinations. The oculist was there to make an examination at so much an examination. He must be paid. There must be a fee found for him. So we find that in this particular case, which is typical of many, in order to get a strap that poor unfortunate soldier needed for his artificial leg, he had to go through two examinations in order that some experts might be able to get a fee. You can not beat that for extravagance. And it is this kind of thing we want to stop.

There is nobody in the bureau who can tell you what anything costs. I do not blame them so very much for not being able to tell you definitely now, because they have only had the bureau in their control for about 10 weeks. But we have made deductions in the recommendations which they made for the conduct of this bureau of $56,000,000. We have taken $37,000,000 off the vocational training recommendations; $18,000,000 off the hospitalization recommendations. We do not do that because we think that is all they need; we do not know what they need; but we do it because we have made up our minds to stop the wastefulness, if you will agree to it, and it is all subject to your agreement, because we are only the instrumentality through which you obtain information on this subject. We have made up our minds to force them to systematize this business and put it on a business basis, and we have said to them that when this money is about to be exhausted they can come back, but when they come back they must have facts. [Applause.] We want to put this business on a respectable basis. If it goes on the way it has gone on it will cost a billion dollars a year after another year. It will become a scandal, and it will not be respectable for a soldier who defended his country's liberty to draw money from the fund. Now, we want the soldier to realize he is not getting charity; that he is not under any obligation. We want him to be able to walk among his fellows with whom he served in the war and not have them look sidewise at him. We want him to realize that we believe in him and that we are going to provide for him, and we are going to protect him against any jugglery of any fund the country appropriates for his care. And it is because of our desire to do this that we have said that this institution must be put upon a business basis.

It can not go on, gentlemen, and be respectable if you are going to spend $10 to pay a man $99. No business in the world would permit that. Why should the Government? And, particularly, why should this sacred fund be used for any such purpose? The man who would overcharge his Government for any service rendered to a soldier who met with difficulty upon the battle field is worse than any profiteer that made overcharges during the war, and we want to search them out and put them where they belong. [Applause.] We want no profiteer in this business. And as far as I can help to prevent any overcharge by any man who is permitted to exercise any function connected with the administration of this sacred fund, I propose to devote my time to it.

Now, I am not in favor of restricting the soldier's rights. I want to see him get every dollar he is entitled to get under the law, but I want the dollars that are appropriated out of the Treasury for him to go to him, and not to go to any profiteer.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I am considerably impressed with what the gentleman has stated. I think there is a good deal of advantage taken. I have thought all the time the administration was rather loose, especially while it was under the Federal board. Very largely, I think, because of such terrific criticism on the part of Congress they were not giving what the soldier wanted. I am impressed that the growth of this fund, unless Congress takes charge of it, somewhere will increase, because everybody that is dissatisfied and wants something else, if he does not get it, is likely to criticize the administration for not giving a transfer from one kind of work the boy is doing to another because he was admittedly unfit to do that work and it would cost additional money. Do the gentlemen of the committee see where this responsibility lies?

Mr. MADDEN. I think we do. We are endeavoring to correct it. I do not blame the director, because he has not been in charge long enough to enable him to visualize the situation. He realizes the extravagant waste. He says he is going to try to eliminate it. We are going to try to show him how to do it, and we are going to cooperate with him in doing it. We have asked that an arbitrary sum, less than is recommended, be appropriated because of our determination to bring him back to us with a plan in a very short time.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I notice that 440,000 have made application.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. They made application mainly because they were urged to do it.

Mr. FESS. The bill under which applications are made provides that only when the soldier returns incapacitated to do his work or to take up some other work is he eligible to education. Is it possible that 440,000 of our soldiers returned incapable of resuming their work?

Mr. MADDEN. Under the law the director says they are required to take anybody's application that served in the war, but that 60 or 70 per cent of the applications now are being rejected. But they have 440,000 applications, and 285,000 of those applications have been passed upon as to the eligibility of the men. One hundred and twenty-eight thousand men at one time or another have been in some sort of training. But the prices paid for machinery and equipment and for the rents and leases and all that sort of thing have been exorbitant, and bills have been rendered by institutions to the War Risk Bureau and paid for services that they never rendered to such an extent that the whole thing is in a state of chaos, and the fund is in a state of—well, of decay. May I say that? [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The existing institutions were not leased but employed to do work instead of establishing Government schools. I frankly say that I am somewhat distressed over the suggestion that we are going to establish Government schools in the various cantonments in which we are going to do all the work that existing institutions might do if they made a reasonable charge. I condemn just as much as my friend does any unreasonable charge. I think it is criminal and ought not to be allowed for a minute. But I am wondering where we are going to drift in expense if we undertake to establish Government schools for these boys.

Mr. MADDEN. I am going to speak on that question. I will not try to do it just now. But I want to say right here that some of the extravagant things about which I would complain are these: For example, we find that dancing lessons were paid for at the rate of $10 a lesson. Now, a man who is able to take dancing lessons is not very badly wounded one would think. The singing lessons were paid for at the rate of $10 a lesson, and auto driving at the rate of $3.75 a lesson, and all such rot as that. That is not the kind of training to qualify anybody for the discharge of proper functions. But even if it were the rate charged and paid is outrageous.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield just for a very short question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MADDEN. I will yield in a very little while. I will first yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SWEET. Is it the intention of the gentleman to discuss the question of hospitalization later on?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. Then, I will not ask my question now.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Were these lessons for the benefit of individuals or classes?

Mr. MADDEN. Individuals.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Ten dollars a lesson for individuals?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; for individuals. There has been purchased equipment for all kinds of institutions, and bills have been paid for services which never have been rendered by those institutions in many cases, and there is plenty of room for the broom of the new Director of the Veterans' Bureau to operate successfully. He has a big job on his hands—a job bigger than any one man really ought to be charged with. Just think! He has a fund here under his jurisdiction of $500,000,000 a year. That is as much as the Government of the United States cost only a few years ago. But no one man was allowed to administer that fund.

Now we are decentralizing the work. We have got 14 divisional headquarters. I asked the Director of the Veterans' Bureau how many men he would be likely to have in one of these headquarters. He said anywhere from 500 to 1,000 each. The average would probably be 800, but more likely a thousand.

Then as to the rent of these headquarters. Why, I find that they are paying as much as $266,000 a year for one divisional headquarters, and $190,000 for another, and $150,000 is the common charge. That is pretty expensive.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit just one question? If he would rather not, I will wait.

Mr. MADDEN. I should rather the gentleman would wait. I think it is much better in the long run, because I think I will meet all those questions.

Now, I do not know how much it will cost to furnish them. There are 140 suboffices. They expect to have 20 men on the average at each suboffice. It is said that the cost of furnishing these suboffices will be $12,000 apiece. Why, $500, it seems to me, would be a reasonable charge for furnishing an office where only 20 men are employed. But allow $1,000, and I think you would have an exorbitant figure. But $12,000! I think it is outrageous.

Are we going to permit this sort of thing to continue? Is there any responsibility to be assumed by the Congress of the United States, or are we going to let them run on as they have been running? Are we going to try to systematize this work for this great patriotic service, so that the men at the top will not waste the money that we are appropriating for the unfortunate men at the bottom? Can we do anything? I think we can. What is the best way to do it? The best way to do it is to make them come here every once in a while, and not to appropriate money for too long a period at a time. [Applause.] Make them show their hand; make them give a reckoning. We have nothing to do with the administration of the service. We can only appropriate, but we can compel them to report to us in detail what they do. That is what we propose now.

Will you help us? I know you will, because you realize that we have no purpose in the world except, first, to see that these men who are entitled to it get the service, and next, to see that the service is not granted to them at a criminal cost.

We have no disposition whatever to subtract from anything that a man is entitled to get, but we have every disposition and determination to see that not a single dollar is paid for overhead that ought not to be paid. [Applause.]

On October 27, 1921, we had 7,815 unoccupied beds in Government hospitals and we had 19,584 occupied beds.

The cost per patient in the Public Health hospitals on its face has been $4.64; but, as a matter of fact, it has run up to about $7 per day per man. We are getting contract hospital service for $3.68 per day per man. The Navy hospital service we get for $3 per day for war veterans, and in the Army hospital service the cost is $3.50, but it is only fair to say in this connection that this includes no overhead charge, and if the overhead were included the Army cost would be $4.24 and the Navy cost would be $4.38. But the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers conducted by the board of managers thereof is the ideally conducted institution. [Applause.] It is the best conducted Government institution we have, economical, decent, clean, and the cost there per patient is $2.20 per day.

Now, why can they not do that everywhere in Government institutions? But the Board of Managers for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers say that they paid to the head doctor to conduct one of these homes, before the War Risk Bureau was organized, $3,000 a year. In the Public Health Service they pay $6,000 a year for doing the same work, and that forced them to pay more than they wanted to pay and more than they would have had to pay. So the cost has been going up everywhere because of the extravagant waste of public money placed in the charge of these people. The appropriations for the Public Health Service for hospital service to war veterans are made to the Veterans' Bureau, and are allotted by the Veterans' Bureau to the Public Health Service and expended by the Public Health Service; and the presumption is that the Public Health Service is required to make a report once a week or once a month as to the state of the allotment and as to costs; but Col. Forbes tells us that he has not been able to get them to make such reports. He has been urging them, telling them that such reports were demanded, but he has not been able to get them, and they have been expending the money so extravagantly that it is a crime. We propose to have a system instituted to compel these people who have control of the Public Health Service to report, as frequently as the Director of the Veterans' Bureau wishes them to report, every detail of expenditure connected with the administration of the Veterans' Bureau fund, and to economize in the expenditure of the money allotted to them in every needful way. Does that answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SWEET. Yes. I am wondering whether or not Col. Forbes made any statement before your committee in regard to hospitalization, as to whether the demands were increasing or not.

Mr. MADDEN. He said that they have 30,000 men in hospitals and that they will not have more than 5,000 more men in the hospitals when they reach the peak. We have 7,815 unoccupied beds now in the various Government hospitals.

Mr. SWEET. In other words the testimony of Col. Forbes before your committee shows that they have adequate facilities at the present time to take care of all those demanding hospitalization?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. And therefore we are not confronted with the question of constructing any more hospitals for the purpose of taking care of these men?

Mr. MADDEN. The hospitals that are now being constructed will relieve some of the contract hospitals in which the men are now placed.

Mr. SWEET. According to the testimony of Col. Forbes, as I understand, the peak of the demand for hospitalization has about been reached?

Mr. MADDEN. He states that there will probably be 5,000 more in hospitals than there now are.

Mr. SWEET. At the present time how many are in contract hospitals?

Mr. MADDEN. It is estimated that there will be an average of 9,162 patients in contract hospitals throughout the year.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I think the gentleman's query was answered by the chairman. The observation I wish to make is that the 7,000 beds now available over and above those necessary for taking care of the men now in the hospitals will take care of the peak load, which is estimated to be 5,000 more than the 30,000 now in the hospitals; so there is evidently no need for further construction of hospitals.

Mr. MADDEN. No. I think I may say that I have information to the effect that the bill now pending in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will not be necessary in order to meet the needs of the service men.

Mr. SWEET. That is the question I had in mind.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Is it not true that the $18,600,000 appropriated in the last Congress as allocated by the Treasury Department will provide for 5,000 beds?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. I will say that in the allocation of that fund, and the location of the hospitals, and the allocation of the amount necessary for each hospital there is a surplus of $1,350,000 that can be turned back into the Treasury.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Has the gentleman any record of how many soldiers have applied for and claimed hospitalization and have been denied it?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not tell the gentleman that offhand. We are told that every man who makes application for training or for compensation is examined, no matter whether he shows any indication of having been wounded or not. If the examination does not disclose definitely the character of his ailment, he is put into a hospital for three or four weeks under observation. During that time it is determined whether or not he is able to conduct his life work without support from the Government. If not, he is either hospitalized or put into training, or he may be put into both.

Mr. ROSSDALE. How about the man who is denied hospitalization?

Mr. MADDEN. Nobody is denied.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I have a case of that kind, and there must be thousands of others.

Mr. MADDEN. Do not let us go into details. Those are details that we could not settle here.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Are the boys in these contract hospitals as well cared for and do they get as good treatment as in the Government hospitals?

Mr. MADDEN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SNELL. As I understood from the gentleman's statement the cost is a great deal less in the contract hospitals.

Mr. MADDEN. It is $3.68 in the contract hospitals and an average of $4.64 in the Public Health Service hospitals, $3 in the Navy and $3.50 in the Army, and $2.20 in the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. SNELL. That is why it is just as well to continue them in the contract hospitals until the peak load is over.

Mr. MADDEN. We have plenty of places into which we can transfer anyone who needs to be transferred.

Mr. SNELL. With buildings you have built and are building at the present time?

Mr. MADDEN. Some of the contract places are not very good, and we ought to take the men away as soon as we can.

Mr. SNELL. And so provision is made to take care of everything?

Mr. MADDEN. So we are advised.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It is my recollection, although I have not the report before me, of reading a report from some especial committee in the Senate three or four weeks ago to the effect that there was need for an additional appropriation for additional hospitals. It was my impression that that was erroneous and not based on facts.

Mr. MADDEN. The information we have leads to the conclusion that the $18,000,000 appropriation for the construction of hospitals will more than meet the present needs and the future needs and leave a surplus. So that the bill pending before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will not be necessary; there will be no need at any time for it. The evidence shows that we need provision for not more than 35,000 men, and we already have it.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds were gathering the information and having it in hand ready to take action whenever the evidence from any competent authority showed that we would have occasion to use it in that direction. We are holding it in reserve because of the facts as stated by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, I wish gentlemen would pay some attention to what I am going to say, not that I am asking you to agree to it, but I want to call it to your attention. To-day vocational training is being given in every available educational institution in the United States and in many factories of various kinds.

It frequently happens that in placement training, which is training in a trade, that the person who takes the training receives compensation both from the employer and from the Government, while the Government pays the man who owns the shop for the training. There ought to be some change in that policy, because it does not seem fair that we should pay somebody to train the man while we are paying the man that is being trained. Sometimes the earning power of these men run as high as $400 a month with triple pay. There ought to be some remedy. I do not mean to say that we ought to take everything away from a man, but it ought to be adjusted along equitable lines so that the Government and the man both will get justice.

Forty-one per cent of the men who are taking training are taking placement training. Placement training means learning a trade. During the training period we furnish them with all kinds of equipment; we do that in any training they take. For example, if a man is going to be a barber, they furnish him with a kit of barber tools. When he gets through, if he ever does—there are only 6,000 out of the whole lot that have got through—they furnish him with a kit of tools to open up his shop. If a man is taking training to be a doctor, they furnish him with medical books during the training and then furnish him with a medical library after he gets through. They do the same thing for a man who is training to be a lawyer. That does not seem to me fair to the man or the Government. To furnish him with the books during his training I think is fair, but to furnish him with books for equipment I do not think is fair.

Suppose he were to be a builder; he would require boilers, engines, and various things of that kind, and we might have to invest a couple of hundred thousand dollars to qualify him for his trade.

Now, I am not saying anything against that which may be finally decided to be just, but we ought to take an inventory of ourselves, and let us have the men with us when we take the inventory. I think they would advise that we are wrong. We have not asked them yet.

If you hand a man too many things you disqualify him for useful service to himself. There is only one way to make a man, and that is to help the man to do something for himself and to depend on himself. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman has touched one very delicate feature of this readjustment, namely, where a man is placed during his training and is being paid by the company for which he works. I was told only a day or so ago by a firm employing one of our men that when he offered him pay the man said he could not take anything because if he did he would lose his allotment from the Government. This man did not believe he should take the service for nothing, and so he told me he was going to let him go on and pay him a lump sum when he got through.

Mr. MADDEN. I think Col. Forbes is going to take that up.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. It strikes me that the way to eliminate this abuse of extravagant overhead is to give each man entitled to it a lump sum of $4,000. We could save many billions of dollars in that way. I am talking about the rehabilitation.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, I come to the question of the advisability or the wisdom of whether or not we should adopt a policy of establishing universities for training in the abandoned Army cantonments. There seems to be a disposition in the mind of the Director of the Veterans' Bureau to take over all the abandoned cantonments and to build bungalows, establish schools and churches, theaters, and what not, where the wounded men can go and live among themselves; to rehabilitate them under conditions which he thinks would be ideal and with which I do not agree at all. [Applause.] But I believe the way to rehabilitate a wounded man who feels that he is down and out, who feels that he has no friends anywhere, that nobody has any use for him, is to put him among men who are sunshine producers; to put him among well men, men that can laugh, and men who live normal lives. [Applause.]

But what have we? Men who were just as normal as anyone else before they made the sacrifice we now find have been made abnormal through that sacrifice, and if we adopt the plan of putting them in colleges of this kind it may possibly result in the same condition that confronts us with respect to the lepers. They are very discontented. No one wants to see them. We want to make these men, if we make them anything, future good citizens of the country. If we are going to spend hundreds of millions or billions of dollars to rehabilitate them, let us get the best results.

There is another side to the thing besides the humanitarian side, as I see it. Of course, it is the selfish side, the money side, but that can not be overlooked, because, after all, it is the money side that we are dealing with here. Back home you know the people whom we represent pay these bills, and, of course, the only way they can pay them is for us to tax them. Of course, we may have reached the limit beyond which we ought not to tax them even for a purpose such as this. We spent several hundred million dollars to build these camps. Col. Forbes said that he could rehabilitate Camp Sherman, at Chillicothe, Ohio, to accommodate the present condition of these men for $20,000. He is a builder, it is said, and, of course, knows what he is talking about; but I have had some years of experience as a builder myself, although I do not travel upon it, and I do not believe that you can rehabilitate Camp Sherman for $20,000,000, and if you undertook to include all of the six camps it is proposed to change over it will cost $300,000,000 before we are through, and we will never be through, and we will never satisfy the men.

There are three problems to be thought of in respect to this. First, we must think about the problem of the Treasury and next about what is going to happen to the men if you put all of the diseased men together. That is the most important problem. The next is what will be the moral effect of this morose condition among the men on the communities in which they are assembled? We have a lot of things to think about. We are dealing with important problems. They are the problems of the lives of men who saved the Nation, and who are going to rule the Nation in the years to come. We will be here for only a short time. The official life of a Member of Congress is not very long, and our places will soon be taken by some one else, but while we are here let us do the thing we would do if there was no one interested in the thing except our own families. [Applause.] We ought to be as much interested in these men as we would be in our own children, for they are our own children, because they come from every home in the land.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would this proposed estimate of great centers of education in these abandoned cantonments require additional substantive legislation to accomplish the purpose, or has the bureau the authority under existing law to go ahead and do it?

Mr. MADDEN. I raised that question when the proposition was approached before our committee. I can say to the gentleman that the committee, fearful that there might be some law somewhere that we were not able to discover, inserted a provision in the bill pending before you which provides that no part of this fund shall be expended for construction in camps except for minor repairs.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Col. Forbes claims authority under existing law, and not only that, but has proceeded to put Camp Sherman into condition for that purpose.

Mr. SWEET. Under what provision of law does he claim that? Under the general provision as to hospitalization?

Mr. MADDEN. He did not make any specific claim. He simply said that he thought he had the power under the law. We do not think he has, but in order to be sure that he does not have under this appropriation, we have placed the limitation in the appropriation to prevent its expenditure for that purpose.

Mr. SWEET. I think that is wise. I know of no provision of law which would give him such authority.

Mr. MADDEN. Gentlemen, I think I have said all that I ought to say. The matter is in your hands. We are giving you the information that we have obtained. The bill is up to you for action. I am very much obliged to you for the consideration you have given me during this talk. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 8347) to authorize the New York Central Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River within the corporate limits of the town of Gary, Ind.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 6053) to amend section 955 of the Revised Statutes by extending the jurisdiction of courts in cases of revivor, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in the campaign of 1920, the Republican Party made very positive promises to the American people. They were solemnly assured that the election of a Republican President and a Republican majority in both Houses of Congress would bring immediate prosperity to the entire country; that business would revive, industry flourish, and there would be a good job at a good wage for every man who might want work. It was declared that while all this was in process of accomplishment, the profiteer would be suppressed and the cost of living reduced. From every stump it was proclaimed that extravagance in governmental expenditures would stop, and that our national expenditures would be cut down and, as a result, taxes would be reduced and the people relieved of much of the tax burden under which they were laboring as a result of the war. Confidently relying on these promises, the people elected the Republican candidate for President and a Republican Congress by an overwhelming majority. For more than eight months the Republican Party has had absolute and undisputed control of every branch of our Government, and it can be said without fear of successful contradiction that none of these pre-election promises have been redeemed. As a result of this failure of Congress and the administration to make good their promises, and to take the steps necessary to relieve the present depressed business conditions, there is greater disappointment and dissatisfaction than has possibly ever before existed in the entire history of our country. The large Republican majority has proven wholly inefficient in affording the relief which the people expected, while the Republican administration has shown an equal inability to lead the party out of the maze of conflicting interests, cross currents of factional differences, and inability to reconcile the demands of the big interests and great wealth which financed its campaign and are now demanding their reward, with the interests of the plain people for whom some of the more liberal of the party stand. Conditions, sir, have not improved as they should have done. Business is still depressed, and industry has not revived since the war to the extent confidently hoped for, while the number of unemployed is increasing and, according to the United States Employment Service, will be larger than ever during the coming winter months.

Congress was called into extra session more than six months ago for the purpose of passing necessary reconstruction legislation and revising and reducing the tax burden. It has wholly failed up to this time to meet the situation, and during all of this time business has been left uncertain as to the amount of taxes to be imposed upon it, and this has added to the confusion and prevented a return to normalcy which the President declared in the last campaign he would surely bring about if elected. Now, after more than six months of active session, a tax bill is about to be passed, which reduces the tax on the larger corporations and incomes which are most able to pay, but which gives no relief or reduction to the taxpayers of more moderate means. It will simply serve to shift part of the burden from the shoulders of the rich to the backs of those less able to pay.

The Republican Party, Mr. Chairman, has had control of Congress practically ever since the signing of the armistice, which was more than three years ago, but there has been no legislation passed which has served to put the profiteer out of business and materially reduce the cost of living to the consumer. No legislation has been passed for the farmer which has served to stimulate the prices which he obtains for his products. The so-called farmers' emergency tariff act was passed with the assertion that it would stimulate the price of farm products, but you can not fool the farmer into believing that this tariff has helped him. In the first place he knows how foolish it is to impose a tariff on products, a large surplus of which is shipped each year to foreign countries. And he knows that, notwithstanding its passage six months ago, the prices of his products have steadily declined, and that he is now receiving far less than the actual cost of production. He knows, also, and the consuming masses know, that the cost of living has by no means been reduced to a proportionate extent, if, indeed, there has been any real material reduction. Labor is dissatisfied and millions are out of employment. Capital is complaining because of the failure to pass important and necessary reconstruction legislation. There has never been a time when Congress so signally failed to measure up to the requirements of the hour in the passage of important, wholesome, and beneficial legislation, and to comply with its solemn pledges to the people, as in the present Congress. [Applause.]

Do you wonder, Mr. Chairman, that there is such great unrest and dissatisfaction? Talk about a return to normalcy! The farmers know it has not meant a fair, reasonable, and living price for the products of their labor. The consuming public knows that it has not meant a decrease in the cost of those necessities of life which they must have in order to live. They know it has not meant a return to anything like the former cost of government.

There was appropriated for the fiscal year 1916, including regular deficiency, miscellaneous, permanent, and indefinite appropriations, the sum of $1,114,490,704.09. This and the preceding Congress, which was also Republican in majority, have appropriated for like purposes for the fiscal year 1922 the sum of $4,088,480,431.23, which includes the amount carried or recommended in the pending bill; or, if you deduct the interest on the war debt of $922,650,000, which was not a charge on the Government in 1916, it will amount to $3,165,830,431.23, or nearly three times the amount in 1916.

I have wondered whether or not my friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], had these figures in mind when he made the statement yesterday that the tax bill which is now in process of passage through Congress will fail to produce sufficient revenue to run the Government to the amount of six or seven hundred million dollars, unless there should be a radical reduction in armament, or whether he had in mind the lower figures which were presented to the Ways and Means Committee in the preparation of that bill. If he had the figures presented to that committee in mind, it is quite evident, from the appropriations actually made by this Congress, that he will have to revise and greatly increase his estimate of the deficit. And let me remind you that this does not include other deficiency bills, carrying many millions of dollars, which we are told must be passed at the next session. And let me say also that this does not represent all that has been authorized to be expended during this fiscal year, for there have been reappropriated out of balances left over from the fiscal year 1921, together with certain further indefinite appropriations, the sum of $256,458,671.03. If these figures are added the amount will run up to more than three times those of 1916, exclusive of the interest on the public debt, which I have omitted in order to be entirely fair, or four times that of 1916 if the interest on the public debt is added.

These figures, Mr. Chairman, are staggering when it is remembered that it has been more than three years since the armistice was signed, and that our Government ought to be getting back at least in some degree to the level of prewar expenditures.

As the Secretary of the Treasury has well said, "the Nation can not continue to spend at this shocking rate." This is the time for the most rigid economy. The country is clamoring for relief from the existing heavy burdens of taxation and that demand can not be met by continuing to make appropriations without regard to the burdens already placed on the people. Congress will have to stop creating new positions at high salaries and unnecessary new commissions and activities. The appropriations committee, the chairman of which is a successful and splendid business man of great executive ability and sincerely anxious to hold down and reduce expenditures, can not cut expenses if Congress continues to authorize additional expenditures. This is no time for extravagance or useless and wasteful expenditure. It is very easy, sir, to carry pledges of economy in party platforms; it is very easy to proclaim the importance of economy from the stump, but it is sometimes both difficult and embarrassing to practice it, but let me remind my colleagues that an overburdened tax-paying public is watching Government expenditures as it never watched before and they will hold Members to the strictest account. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, is it any wonder in view of the record that the people are not only intensely disappointed but dissatisfied with this Congress on account of its failure to reduce Government expenditures?

But, Mr. Chairman, the obligation does not rest upon Congress alone. Unless the administrative branch of the Government practices economy, there can be no real economy, for Congress must base its appropriations for existing activities largely upon recommendations submitted for the needs of the various services. And, let me say that this economy must be real. There must be something more than widely published interviews and statements of what is going to be saved, specially prepared for the public. The people have been fed up on that kind of propaganda during the last six months. What the people demand is evidence that these statements are going to be made good. And let me suggest that this can best be shown at the end of the fiscal year, rather than by loud boasts at the beginning of the fiscal year.

The Director of the Budget told the Committee on Ways and Means while it was preparing the revenue bill that he was going to save $350,000,000 out of the regular appropriations for this fiscal year. No member of that committee was able to tell just from what sources that saving was to come, for they were not furnished, so far as the Congress knows or the public knows, with a bill of particulars. We were given nothing more specific than that this sum was to come from the following departments and independent establishments:

War Department	50,000,000
Navy Department	100,000,000
Shipping Board	100,000,000
Department of Agriculture	25,000,000
Railroads	50,000,000
Miscellaneous	25,000,000

It is rather singular that despite this claim of intended savings Congress was called upon in August to augment the Shipping Board appropriations by the sum of $48,500,000 in a deficiency bill, and that if it had followed the advice of the Director of the Budget there would have been appropriated $125,000,000, for that was the amount of his estimate. Is it not also singular, in view of that declaration of saving, which was sent broadcast over the country, that Congress is now called upon, before five months of the fiscal year has passed, to appropriate $103,698,221.77, with the promise of more to come? And do not forget that some of this appropriation is for the very departments in which it was said that these savings were to be effected. Ah, Mr. Chairman, if these savings are really expected to be made, why make new appropriations? Why not divert the money so saved to the purposes set forth in this bill? Why not have covered this money back into the Treasury, so that it could not be spent during the fiscal year? Why not have passed the bill which I introduced directing that this be done?

How did the Director of the Budget arrive at this alleged saving? He has never told Congress. I suspect, Mr. Chairman, that he arrived at it in part by anticipating what some of the bureaus will probably cover back into the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year, as is a matter of common custom. For there has never been a year that some of the bureaus did not for one reason or another fail to spend all the money appropriated for it, and yet past administrations have never taken credit for this. Why, in the past 20 years there has been covered back into the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year amounts ranging from over $9,000,000 when our expenditures were much less than $1,000,000,000 per annum, to over $7,000,000,000 in 1919, under a Democratic administration, the greater part of which were war appropriations. We are told, Mr. Chairman, in the hearings that the Director of the Budget ordered that an arbitrary sum be set aside in various departments and bureaus. For instance, there was appropriated for the Bureau of Public Health for the fiscal year 1922 slightly over $4,000,000 for medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies. The Director of the Budget ordered that 10 per cent of this sum, or $400,000, be set aside, with the statement that it would remain in the Treasury and still be available if needed during the fiscal year. Before five months of the year has passed we are told that one-half of this sum, or $200,000, is to be spent, and I dare say that the remainder of the sum so set aside will be spent before the end of the fiscal year, and yet the Director of the Budget has taken credit over the country for this as one of his savings. And those of us who are familiar with the tendency of departments and bureaus to spend all the money placed in their hands will not be surprised if other departments and bureaus spend all the money which has been similarly set aside before the expiration of the fiscal year, with the exception of the War and Navy Departments.

Hundreds of millions of dollars should be saved as a result of a reduction of armament, which it is hoped and believed will be brought about by the conference now sitting in Washington, which was called at the instance of Congress and on demand of the people. And let me say that I hope that under the wise and statesmanlike leadership of our very able and distinguished Secretary of State there will be something more than an agreement to reduce armament, important and necessary as that is. It is time that the billions of dollars which the nations are spending on armament should be diverted to useful channels. But we all know that a reduction of armament will not necessarily serve to prevent future wars. I hope, therefore, that as a result of this conference there will also be an agreement among the nations assembled to preserve the future peace of the world, such as was contemplated by the League of Nations. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, there must be the utmost economy in appropriations and expenditures in the future. There must be a reduction and a return more nearly to prewar expenditures in the interest of an overburdened tax-paying public. If Congress fails to do this, it will not meet the insistent demands of the people, and we, as Members of Congress, will prove recreant to the trust imposed in us. [Applause.]

As the gentleman from Illinois has stated, the pending deficiency appropriation bill carries $103,698,221.77. It is based on estimates which amount to $190,534,653.22. It is not my purpose to discuss the various details of the bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. These estimates are supervised by the Bureau of the Budget, are they not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then the Bureau of the Budget, that is so economical, has asked for $86,000,000 more than the committee thinks it is entitled to at this time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will explain to the gentleman how the most of that reduction occurs. I wish to repeat here that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is sincerely in favor of economy, and he is bringing to his work as chairman of the committee the benefit of his splendid business training and unusual ability. There will be economy in this Congress if Congress will follow his lead on the question and subject of appropriation. The greater part of this reduction from the estimates is represented by the reductions in the estimates submitted for the Veterans' Bureau, which were so fully and clearly explained by the gentleman from Illinois.

In addition to that there were $27,000,000 asked for by the Navy Department, but the request was withdrawn by that department in view of matters transpiring here in Washington at this time and the uncertainty whether all or any part of it would be later on needed.

Now, the reductions in the estimates submitted for the Veterans' Bureau and which were unanimous on the part of the committee were not made because any member of that committee is not anxious and willing to appropriate every single dollar that is necessary for the aid and the comfort of every disabled soldier. I take it that there is not a Member of this Congress on either side of the Chamber who is not anxious to see every dollar appropriated that is necessary for the aid and comfort of the disabled soldier; but, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] stated, in the hearings it developed that there was a total lack of information on the part of those appearing as to just how this money was expended in so far as the administrative expenses were concerned and little intention to curtail this administrative expense, judging by the statements made as to future expenses. Why, it developed, as has already been told you, that the administrative expenses amount to over 10½ per cent, or more than $10 out of every $100 which is appropriated for the soldier. The director stated that in his opinion 7 per cent was not an undue amount. That might be true if the appropriation was a small one, but when you stop to consider that the bureau is spending now something over $480,000,000 a year, I submit that 7 per cent of that huge amount taken for administrative expenses in the payment of salaries and to employees who did not serve in the war and for whose benefit the appropriation was not made, is exorbitant, and the chairman of the committee very properly said to the director and to those appearing that Congress wanted and demanded more specific information as to just how this money is expended. And therefore the committee has recommended to Congress the appropriation at this time of $40,000,000 for vocational training and $25,000,000 for hospitalization of soldiers, in addition to the money already appropriated.

We know that that is not going to be sufficient for the balance of the fiscal year. We know that later on it will be necessary to appropriate more money, but that money is appropriated now in order that this work will not be stopped or be affected in any way, and when the bureau comes back to the committee later on for the purpose of getting additional appropriations it is hoped and expected that Congress will be able to get more information as to just the nature of these administrative expenses.

Why, it developed in the hearings—to show you the extravagance of this training so far as administration is concerned—that physicians are being paid a minimum of $5 for the examination of a soldier. In other words, a soldier of the late war enters the office of a physician and is examined, and that physician is paid $5 for the slightest examination and possibly as much as $50 for one which is extraordinary or by a specialist. He walks out of the office, and then a soldier of the Civil War or the Spanish-American War enters for the purpose of being medically examined in support of his claim for pension, and the doctor is paid only $3 for that examination.

Mr. MADDEN. And it was only $2 up to the period of the war.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. There is no excuse for that sort of thing.

Now, I hope that the present director, who took charge of the entire work of compensation, hospitalization, and training under the reorganization which went into effect on August 9, will correct that sort of abuse prior to the time the bureau comes back for an additional appropriation.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. The gentleman spoke of the fee that was allowed to the examining physician. Is it not also true that the applicant, or the soldiers themselves, are sent to great distances, from 50 to 100 miles, to these doctors, when they might get some physician close by to make the examination?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think that is true.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Therefore the Government is paying out a large amount for railroad fare.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true. Of course, I think it is necessary for the bureau to have certain physicians specially designated, upon whom they can rely for these examinations. I take it that it would be impracticable to have a physician located in every small town in the entire country. Therefore, a certain amount of transportation and travel will always be necessary.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. But is it not a fact that there are competent physicians in almost every county where a man can go to the county seat and save all this unnecessary railroad fare, instead of crossing three or four counties to get examined?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, that is true. There were plenty of competent physicians employed during the war for the purpose of examining the men who went into the war and acting for the draft boards. The good doctors do not all live in the cities and larger towns.

Now, we are to have a decentralization under the Sweet bill. Fourteen regional offices have been ordered by act of Congress, to be established over the country, with a maximum of 140 sub-offices, 124 of which have been already established. Of course, the director of the bureau has no other alternative but to carry out the law as written by Congress, although the number of sub-offices is left to his discretion. But, gentlemen, speaking for myself alone, I believe that that particular feature of that law is going to prove very unsatisfactory. I know that it will necessarily increase the administrative expenses of this great and necessary work. Why, as the chairman of the committee has stated, it will be necessary to pay great amounts for rent in the establishment of these offices. There will be 500 or 600 employees in these regional offices, and in some cases probably a thousand or more. In addition to that, there will be a large force required for the sub-offices.

In addition to that, as the chairman has stated, it has been stated that $12,000 will be necessary to furnish and equip each of these various sub-offices over the country, an amount wholly out of all reason and entirely unjustifiable.

Mr. BOX. Does the gentleman mean to state that there would be 500 to 1,000 employees in each regional office?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In each office. They will range from 500 to 1,000, or possibly more. I know I have had this experience myself even in this short length of time. A soldier may write here and request you to secure information concerning his claim, which has been pending for some time in the bureau. You call at the bureau for the purpose of looking into the record and learning just why the claim has not been acted upon, and you are told, as to my section, that the records and papers have been sent down to Atlanta and that they will take the matter up with the Atlanta office by correspondence and will advise you as soon as they receive a reply. I know this is true, for I have had that experience several times in the last few weeks. After the lapse of two or three weeks you will get a reply that the claim is being considered or that certain additional evidence is needed. All of this involves delay, during which the soldier is suffering from lack of attention.

Mr. PARRISH. Can the gentleman tell us in any concrete way what the estimated expense for the Veterans' Bureau will be for the next fiscal year—the total expense?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think it will amount to something like $480,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. The present expenditures?

Mr. PARRISH. For this present fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. Four hundred and eighty-nine million dollars.

Mr. GARNER. What will be the probable future expense? It will be more?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; it will grow.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And this decentralization, as I have shown, will necessarily increase the administrative expense—just how much, no one can tell until this installation has been completed and all the employees put in charge.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it the gentleman's opinion, from any evidence that may have been offered before the committee, that this policy of so-called decentralization so far has worked for expedition and economy in the handling of these claims, or is it going in the long run to result in duplication and unnecessary expense?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. According to the testimony it has not worked for either economy or expedition. My own experience has been that conditions in the bureau have certainly not improved over the conditions that existed previously, and I am very charitable when I make that statement. Frankly, there have been, in my judgment, more mistakes and more delay in many respects. I understand that all the records pertaining to the disabled soldiers who are drawing pay or who have applied for compensation and training are going to be sent from the city of Washington to the regional office which has jurisdiction of claims in that particular locality. It has been stated through the newspapers—and I have not seen it denied—that no duplicate copy of these records is going to be kept here in Washington. The original records should have been kept here and photographic copies sent to the regional offices. Gentlemen can well see that if these records are sent broadcast over the country to these various offices, many of them are likely to be lost, some of them may be destroyed by fire, and considerable confusion may result in the future on account of that.

Now, so far as economy is concerned, everyone must admit that it is going to greatly increase the administrative expense of the operation of that bureau, enormous as it now is, because you can not establish 14 regional offices throughout the country and establish 140 sub-offices without fully manning them, and without involving an expense of leasing, furnishing, and equipping those offices.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Would not that method be likely to result in the destruction of the permanent evidence upon which a soldier's claim might be based in future years, and if lost he has lost the evidence on which he would assert his rights?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly, and I would say to the gentleman that I think that is the most serious objection to the dissemination or scattering of these original records over the country. I think it is much more serious than the amount of money which may be involved in the extra cost of administration.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. After this decentralization process is it the intention of the bureau here to keep a corps of employees, a large number of them, and operate here practically as usual, while having also the great number of employees at the district offices, where the claims are finally to be disposed of? I noticed in a newspaper recently a statement that there was nothing unusual about the matter, the statement issuing from the War Risk Bureau, that they expected to keep the force of employees here and also the district offices. There were also expressions indicating that the employees here were going to be dispensed with and distributed throughout the country in the Veterans' Bureau district offices where they might want to go in accordance with their preferences, so far as they could be carried out. Has the gentleman any information on that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee has no special information as to what will be the personnel in Washington after this decentralization goes fully into effect. As I stated awhile ago, the director and those appearing for the bureau were unable to give definite and full information to the committee at the hearings as to the character and nature of their future administrative expenses. But it is hoped, and the director has promised, that he will have full and complete information when he next appears before the committee.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman think it would be necessary to equip this bureau here with anything like the same number that it now has and at the same time go through the decentralization process and allow these claims to be adjudicated in the various districts? In other words, should not the decentralization result in the distribution of the forces here in the bureau?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I should think that would be inevitable, but the gentleman will realize, of course, that there will always be a necessity for quite a number of employees here, because this is the main headquarters, and many letters will be sent and many inquiries will be made to the bureau here which will, as I have stated, have to be passed along to the various suboffices throughout the country. In the bureau here in Washington there are 5,546 employees at the present time, with a force of 10,622 in the field, or a total of 16,168. But as I gather from the hearings, that force is going to be considerably augmented when all these offices are fully established throughout the country.

Mr. BRIGGS. What increase is that in the number over last year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think it is a decrease, so far as the personnel here in Washington is concerned. Just how it compares with last year's field force, I am not at this moment able to say.

Mr. BRIGGS. I mean the total.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sorry, but I can not give the gentleman those figures. There has been a decrease in the office force here in Washington.

Mr. BRIGGS. Were there not about 6,500 in the bureau last year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is my impression; something in that neighborhood.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does the gentleman get any definite view from the hearings as to why the administration of the law is so unsatisfactory by the bureau at this time, involving so many delays and so many mistakes and so much confusion in the handling of claims? I am speaking now from my own experience.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have had an experience similar to that of the gentleman, but I must confess that I have never been able to secure any information satisfactory to me as to just why there should be such confusion and delay. I know that it is provoking and has provoked very great criticism among the soldiers and the public generally throughout the country, because these soldiers, of course, are entitled to have their claims acted upon quickly. I want to say that this has not been due to the action of Congress, because in every appropriation bill Congress has freely appropriated whatever amount the Bureau of War Risk said was necessary. Congress has freely made the appropriation of the amount asked for in order that these disabled soldiers may be given every possible attention and their claims quickly passed upon. Just why there is such great delay in the bureau and why it is continuing up to this time, I do not know, except that it is the fault of the administration.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. While nearly all of us, including the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and myself, voted for that so-called decentralization bill and for the establishment of division offices throughout the country, it has been my observation that that has simply distributed the responsibility and resulted in still further passing the buck, and that it is more difficult to get speedy and effective action now than it was before.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the gentleman is clearly correct. He voices what I believe to be the experience of every Member of Congress who has had constituents with claims pending before the bureau since the decentralization went into effect.

Now, gentlemen, something has been said with reference to the hospitalization of soldiers. As I have stated, the committee have recommended an appropriation at this time of $25,000,000. The bureau estimated for something over $43,000,000. The committee in reducing this estimate had no intention or idea of depriving any soldier of hospitalization, and the amount recommended by the committee will be ample to carry the work for some time to come and to provide for hospitalization for every soldier entitled to it, and until more definite information can be secured as to the manner of expenditure in the bureau. The whole idea of the committee has been to appropriate every dollar necessary to carry on this work; but we are anxious to secure information to be submitted to Congress, which will enable Congress to cut down some of these high administrative expenses and cut out some of these unnecessary salaries that are now being paid.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. In studying this question has the gentleman discovered any immediate pressing need for enlarged appropriations for hospital buildings at this time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I have not, because Col. Forbes stated that there are now in hospitals 30,000 men in round numbers and that the peak will be 35,000. In other words, according to Col. Forbes, after what he stated was a most careful comparison and investigation, there will never at any time in the future be needed more than 5,000 additional beds. Now, it developed in the hearing that there are to-day 7,815 vacant beds which can be used for the hospitalization of soldiers.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I desire this information in order that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds may have before it the judgment of this committee after its investigation of that very important matter.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know that it is stated by the bureau that many of these patients are in contract hospitals, in private institutions, and the bureau is very anxious to gather all the patients into Government institutions.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Especially those who may be in places where the treatment is not as good as we desire it to be.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, yes, indeed, and, of course, that ought to be done in cases of that kind. But I submit that if they will never at any time need more than 5,000 additional beds and there are now vacant beds to the number of 7,815 it would seem that there is no pressing necessity at this particular time for additional hospital legislation.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Especially in view of the 5,000 beds to be provided by the buildings now in course of construction.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. I am glad the gentleman suggested that, for I had in mind the additional beds which will be provided by the $18,600,000 recently appropriated, all of which has been allocated except $1,300,000. In the great Speedway Hospital which cost so much money, a modern, up-to-date hospital erected in Chicago, with a capacity of 1,000 beds, it appears that there are only 472 patients at the present time, and that actually one-third of the space of that hospital is now being used for the housing of employees of the hospital. It would seem to me that the best interests of the soldiers and a proper administration of the bureau would be attained by devoting that space, amounting to 337 rooms, to the hospitalization of soldiers rather than to the housing of employees, and to require those employees to secure quarters outside of the hospital.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is it possible that it takes 337 rooms to house the employees of one hospital?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the statement that was made at the hearings, but that is not all the story—

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Did it appear how many of the employees of that hospital resided outside of the hospital, in addition to the number residing in the hospital?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My recollection is that it was stated that there are about 125 employees housed on the outside in addition to those being taken care of in the hospital. Whether each of those 337 rooms is occupied by a single person, or just how many rooms are set apart for each particular employee, I do not know. I do not know whether each employee has one room or a suite of rooms.

Mr. BOX. How many patients are served by a hospital that has 337 rooms for its employees?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The records show that at the Speedway Hospital, which, as I have stated, has 472 patients, there are over 500 employees, or more than one to each patient. Of course, the gentleman will understand that that includes all kinds of employees necessary in a big hospital, but it would seem to be unreasonable.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman mean that all of them live at the hospital?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I have just stated that my recollection is that 125 of them are quartered on the outside, but that one-third of the space in that hospital, which ought to be used solely for the hospitalization of soldiers, is being used in the quartering of employees of the hospital.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think that is substantially correct. Originally the hospital was intended to contain seven units for the care of soldiers, and two of those units were taken for the care of the hospital personnel. That was done upon the very insistent and urgent request of the Public Health Service. I think the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at that time took an adverse view and were very anxious that the whole of the hospital facilities should be used for soldiers, but the Public Health Service said they ought to have this space for the hospital personnel.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My own judgment is that when there has been such a great demand on the part of many for additional hospital facilities and when the complaint is made that many of the hospitals are not modern and up to date that this great modern hospital in Chicago ought to be devoted entirely to the soldiers rather than to the civilians who are drawing money out of the Public Treasury and who are employed in its operation; that these civilians rather than the soldiers should be located on the outside.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is my own view, and the records of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will show that the committee is unanimous in that view. However, I want to say that my information is that there are now about 650 soldiers at that hospital.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That may be; the number may have been increased. The statement was made less than two weeks ago that there are only 472. I think the entire hospital ought to be devoted to the care and treatment of the ex-soldiers. I hope the bureau will speedily fill it up and put the employees on the outside and require them to get quarters in the neighborhood.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Taking into account the amount appropriated in this bill how much is the total amount expended this year for the care of ex-service men?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has been stated that the total amount for all services will be $489,000,000. I should say that no one expects that the amount in this bill plus what has already been appropriated will be sufficient to carry on this work during the remainder of the fiscal year. There will undoubtedly be needed an appropriation of a very large sum in addition in order to properly train and hospitalize the soldiers. I am sure that every Member of Congress wants to provide every dollar needed to train the disabled soldiers. There are 128,000 who have entered training and only 6,000 have completed the training. There are something like 31,000 now on the qualified and eligible list and more are being added as the result of examinations. Now, at the present rate of putting these men in training—a rate of 4,000 a month—gentlemen will see that the last man on the present list will not be put into training for eight months. He ought not to be required to wait such an unreasonable time. I am sure that if the Congress can be satisfied that the money is being expended for the soldier and not to pay high salaries and overhead administration expenses, it will be willing to make any appropriation necessary to give these men speedy training. It is a duty that Congress owes to the disabled soldier, and besides the economic interest of the country demands that he be trained and put into the productive walks of life as quickly as possible.

Mr. McDUFFIE. How much will the Government spend this year for the care of the soldiers?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is impossible for me to answer that question because, as I say, there will have to be additional appropriations. It is expected that the director will later on give an accurate survey of expenses. I can only say that present expenditure has been at the rate of $489,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It was stated in the press that Col. Forbes had returned from a tour of inspection throughout the country, particularly in the West and the Middle West, and had given out a statement to the effect that the present system for vocational training was very unsatisfactory, and he soon would make a definite recommendation in regard to vocational training. Did he give the committee any indication as to what his ideas were?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The director stated that it was his intention, if permitted to do so, to organize four to six training centers in the various Army cantonments. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] went fully into that matter, and I want to say that I fully agree with him in what he had to say about the establishment of these centers. None of them have been established except at Camp Sherman, where some work has been done and which will be in a condition to take 500 men by December 1, with a maximum capacity, if the work is completed, of 3,000 men; but there has been nothing further done and the committee has recommended to Congress a provision in this bill which will serve to prevent the establishment of any great centers of training in Army camps, because the committee is convinced that it should not be done for several reasons. In the first place, it is going to cost many, many thousands of dollars to reconstruct and rearrange the various camps and cantonments and provide necessary equipment. In addition to that, I take it that the disabled soldier will be much less satisfied if he is trained in one of these camps than he would be if he was trained in some suitable private institution at a reasonable charge, where he would be associated with other men acquiring a similar training, but not suffering from the disabilities from which he is suffering.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BOX. Has the gentleman been able to make an estimate of what it costs to train a soldier a year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; it is not my estimate, but it was stated to the committee that it cost on an average $126 a month. That includes the compensation and overhead expenses, cost of tuition, and all the various items that go into the training of the soldier. It is, roughly, $1,500 a year for each soldier.

Mr. LEA of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Has the gentleman been able to make an estimate of what it costs to train a soldier a year?

Mr. LEA of California. Has the gentleman stated the length of time it will be necessary to train a soldier?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My recollection is about two and a half years. There are a little over 40 per cent of those who have applied who asked for training in mechanical trades and occupations of that kind. Thirty per cent applied for various forms of academic or professional training, and, as the gentleman knows, that term is usually four years, but the average is about two and a half years.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. How long a period does the law provide that an ex-service man can apply for training?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is no limit on the time for application.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then, 10 years from now, unless the law is changed, if a man found that he was suffering from the effects of his service in the war, he could apply for vocational training?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; and I must say that I think he should be given the training if it is shown that his trouble is due to his military service.

Mr. DUNBAR. There is no doubt that many soldiers in the service suffered a shock to their nervous and physical systems which will not be in evidence until years have gone by. What is the gentleman's idea as to what will be the probable cost of vocational training in years to come?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, at the present rate of the expenditure, it is going to be very heavy; but I take it there is no man living who can even form the slightest idea as to what it will cost ultimately.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then, this cost of vocational training is going to be a big item which will prevent us from returning to a condition of normalcy which the gentleman mentioned awhile ago?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This cost is going to amount to a very great deal during the years to come. It is one of those things which was brought about by the war and which the public is very glad to bear, provided the money appropriated is applied for the benefit of the soldier and not some official or officeholder.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. While we are on the item of training, it has been suggested that the soldiers are provided in many cases, or in all cases where they have an academic and professional training, with the equipment such as tools or libraries. I would like to know what information the gentleman has on that point? For instance, take the man who reads law. It is said that he is given a set of law books, and the man who studies medicine is fitted out with certain instruments, and that the barber is fitted out with his tools and a chair, and so forth?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand that has been the policy of the bureau in the past. So far as I am concerned, I can not understand why it is the duty of the Government which has trained the soldier as a lawyer to then provide him with a full law library, which of course the gentleman knows is expensive. I am happy to say that the present director states that that policy will not be followed hereafter.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. The gentleman I believe has been on the Committee on Appropriations for a number of years. Has the committee made any such appropriation with that object in view heretofore?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Has the Congress passed any law which in the gentleman's opinion and judgment specifically provided for that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think so, or at least it has been so construed. The fact of the business is that the so-called Sweet law is very broad in its scope, as the gentleman knows, and it is insisted by officials of the bureau, and I think they are confirmed in that by the Comptroller General of the Treasury, that they have the right if they see fit to provide suitable tools and equipment, not only during the course of training but after the training has been completed, to equip the trainee to whatever extent they think is reasonable to carry on his trade or profession.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. The Sweet bill, as I understand, was a part of the Republican administration for economy.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; but I think the most of us voted for it.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. If I understand, it was not mandatory, but simply a provision which they have the right to carry out, and in the exercise of that brand of Republican economy they have gone to that extent.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think that is true, but it is only fair to say that that has been the course pursued by the past, as well as the present, administration of the bureau. The present director stated that in so far as law libraries are concerned he is going to cut them out in the future. Just what position he will take with reference to furnishing tools to those trained for the mechanical trades I do not know.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. What about doctors?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the statement with reference to lawyers would apply to doctors and all the professions.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, I am interested in learning that vocational training will prepare an ex-service man for being a lawyer. What physical or mental defect would cause an ex-service man to want to learn to be a lawyer?

Mr. STEVENSON. It might be a moral defect.

Mr. LONDON. Moral obliquity, I suppose.

Mr. DUNBAR. I can hardly understand a condition in which an ex-service man would find himself as a result of having been in the service that would make him peculiarly fitted to be a lawyer.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Congress intended by the passage of the legislation, I think, to permit the disabled soldier to choose his profession or trade, provided, in the opinion of those in charge of the administration of the law, he was fitted or could be properly trained for the profession or trade selected by him. I do not think there was any intention to dictate to the soldier as to what he should do under these limitations.

Mr. DUNBAR. Does vocational training also afford an opportunity for an ex-service man to become a minister of the gospel?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. And will it give him a theological education?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; provided, of course, it is found that he has the proper groundwork, and has received training in the past, which convinces those having charge of the bureau of the fact that he is fundamentally fitted to take that training.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FESS. There was no idea originally to extend the training to professional education, but we found that many of the boys had gone to the law school for probably about two years and had been taken out and had gone into the service and been wounded. It was thought that they ought to be given the privilege of finishing their work. Personally I was opposed to including any professional training at all, but those conditions arose. I might say now that I can not understand how under the law it can be construed that after education he is to be given an equipment like a law library. I can understand that the books he was given to study from while he was in school he might be allowed to retain, but to give him anything like a library to work on, in that or anything else, or to give him tools with which to carry on a trade after he comes out, I know I never thought was within the construction of the law as we passed it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I confess to the gentleman I was very much surprised to learn that practice had been followed.

Mr. FESS. We all thought, and I feel sure the gentleman himself did, that we ought not to cut out these suboffices to too great a degree.

We are told that if you had 140 which were already provided in some other work, that it would be cleaned up within a very short time; that we would mop up the whole work and the suboffices would be discontinued within a short time. That was the representation made to Congress. I am amazed to hear that these subdivisions have been equipped with $12,000 worth of office furniture.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They have not been equipped, I will say to the gentleman, but that is the estimate submitted to the committee as to what will be necessary to equip them.

Mr. FESS. I think that is an outrage.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think so myself.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Just a question, and then I will conclude.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The gentleman from Indiana has raised a point as to what physical disqualification would entitle or justify a soldier to seek a professional education in the law. Now, it would seem to me if a soldier had the fundamental education, an academical education, sufficient to justify his entry into the law, the fact that he may have lost a limb would be sufficient justification for a soldier to take up that profession.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think that is the theory upon which Congress acted, just as the gentleman from Ohio has stated, who had such an important part to do with the framing of that legislation.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Is there not some way to hold the head of these administrative officers responsible for the expenditure of money in buying libraries and trade equipments?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, they are responsible, but if they are acting within the law—

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Is there not some way in which they could be restrained?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They could be restrained if Congress were to take action. But it is an administrative matter, and those in charge of the bureau have held that they have the right under the law to provide this equipment.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Does the committee concur in their view of that right?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am frank to say to the gentleman, no, so far as I am concerned, because I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess] that Congress never expected that law libraries should be furnished lawyers.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. From the discussion we have had here, it is a flagrant abuse of power.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will ask the gentleman this question: If that is the view of the committee, why could we not write in the appropriation bill a limitation on the bureau to do that thing?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The trouble about that as I see it is that it will be rather difficult to draw the line as to just what the bureau should furnish a man in training. In other words, a man who is taking law, for instance, needs certain textbooks required in the training. Just to what extent are you going to limit the amount of law books that should be furnished or the tools that may be furnished to a man taking instruction in one of the mechanical trades? I think after all it has to be left to the discretion of those in charge of administering the law, who understand that Congress does not commend that kind of expenditure.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think you can stop it without putting a proper limitation in the law itself.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The present director says he is going to stop it, and I hope he will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is said that they have been furnishing libraries and tools and equipment to a man who has finished his training, but certainly that was not in the contemplation of the framers of the law. I had charge of the bill in its original form, and a proposition of that kind would have astounded the Committee on Education when they had the bill under consideration.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sure of that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It seems to me that so far as furnishing these men with training equipment, libraries, and so forth, after they have finished training a limitation of some sort ought to be written into the law.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I agree with the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, I have consumed more time than I had intended, and I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] for 10 minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, while the body of the unknown soldier lay in the Rotunda of this Capitol November 10, a committee representing the American Legion of the State of Michigan came to place beside it a wreath of flowers. There beside the casket a brief service was held in the presence of these representatives of the Legion, the Senators and Representatives of Michigan, and others.

Our colleague, Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY, dean of the Michigan delegation in Congress, spoke as follows:

Let this be a tribute of the American Legion of the State of Michigan to the Nation's unknown dead. It carries with it the love, the gratitude, and the admiration of our people. The heroes we pay homage to this day have given the great sacrifice. The story of their individual deeds of valor is a closed book. Their lifeless bodies, however, evidence their love of their country. We cherish their memory. It is indeed fitting that we should gather here to-day in their honor.

Capt. Paul A. Martin, commander of the American Legion of Michigan, gave the following brief and eloquent address:

Soldier of the Republic, a Nation and a world bow in solemn reverence at your bier.

Home from the far-flung battle fields of France, out of a lonely and a nameless grave, you have come home, here to find a resting place in the land for which you paid the last full measure of devotion.

No State can claim you as its very own, for you are now of the Nation.

No name is yours, for the only name you bear is that of the legions who, like you, faced the great adventure with a smile, and, smiling, died.

The Nation that pays you tribute to-day is a grateful Nation. It and its people are not unmindful of the fact that but for you and your sacrifice it might have perished. For when a nation reaches such a state of decadence that the men who live for it are not willing, if need be, to die for it, then that nation is no longer fit to live and its doom is sealed.

America lives to-day because its sons have died to save it. It exists to-day because myriads of others, like you, soldier of the Republic, were willing to die that the ideals upon which your Nation was founded might not perish from the earth. It lives to-day because out of the greed and selfishness and distrust of mankind and of nations there have risen those divine elements of patriotism, of unselfishness, and of blind devotion to duty, which since the beginning of time have caused men and women to place country first, even to the sacrifice of life itself.

The Nation and the world mourn your passing. A hundred million hearts are pouring out their gratitude to you to-day, and at your tomb for time eternal millions will come to pay tribute, a tribute that comes only to the truly great, a tribute that comes only to the men who, without thought of personal gain or glory, sacrifice their all that their country may live.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7428) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate Gonzaga College in the city of Washington and District of Columbia."

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the matter to which I desire to address myself in the time allotted to me is not strictly germane to the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not necessary. This is general debate.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I accepted an invitation to make an address before the American Legion post, at Welch, McDowell County, in West Virginia, on Armistice Day. Having taken some pains in the preparation of the address, and feeling that its subject matter was of some public interest, I asked unanimous consent of the House that the address might be printed in the RECORD as an extension of remarks, which request the House graciously granted unto me. The next day I found the address in the RECORD, and saw that it was printed with very small type; so small, in fact, that it would almost require a magnifying glass to decipher it. I was puzzled to know why this had taken place. On previous occasions I had inserted in the RECORD, and friends of mine had inserted in the RECORD, as many as three addresses of similar character, made by me on public occasions, and in each of these instances the addresses, respectively, had been printed in the regular type.

Now, this address was inserted in the RECORD of November 14, 1921—last Monday. On the margin of the paper I had specially noted in writing the request that the printer should print the document in the regular size type.

At my hotel about 10 o'clock of that day I was called up by some one at the Printing Office and advised that Mr. Carter, the Public Printer, had directed that this speech be printed in smaller type. Whether his instructions were in general or applied specially to this case was not made clear to me. Probably you are already advised that the larger type is known as 8-point, formerly brevier, and that the smaller type is known as 6-point, or nonpareil.

In the examination of the RECORD of November 14 I find side by side with the address that I had asked to be inserted an extension of remarks by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE], which is printed in the larger type. I can see no justification for a rule of the Public Printer that would discriminate as to the size of type to be used in printing the two speeches. On another page in this RECORD I find a request by our distinguished floor leader, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], asking permission to insert in the RECORD the addresses of our great President and the distinguished Secretary of State, which was granted, and these were printed in the usual size type.

The conclusion, Mr. Chairman, to which I have arrived is, that had I not voted against the Blanton resolution perhaps my speech would have been printed in the ordinary type, just as had been done in the case of a Memorial Day speech in the national cemetery at Grafton, W. Va., June 3, 1919, and an address on Abraham Lincoln at Harpers Ferry on February 15, 1920.

I now call upon the Joint Printing Committee of the House and Senate to know whether or not any Member of this House, it matters not what his mental caliber may be, whether he is a star of the first magnitude or of some lesser magnitude, may have the Public Printer or anyone else determine whether or not his speech shall go into the RECORD as brevier or nonpareil; whether it shall go in in such form as may be legible and can be read, or shall be published in print almost as difficult to decipher as the ancient cuneiform characters or other Egyptian hieroglyphics, that have to be exposed by the magnifying glass and interpreted by the use of the Rosetta stone? If this speech be of any value at all, it is entitled to be printed in such form as that it may be legible, and if it were not of any value some Member of the House, of patriotic instincts, who wanted to save useless expenditure of public funds should have interposed an objection.

This is all I have to say, gentlemen. I thank you very much. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BURTON). The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the speech I referred to may be printed in the ordinary type.

The CHAIRMAN. On what page?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. It is found in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that his remarks appearing in the RECORD on November 14 may be reprinted, to appear in the ordinary type. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have no objection. I think the gentleman appears to have presented a reasonable complaint, but I am wondering whether the Committee of the Whole can order that to be done. It is not dealing with the matter under consideration. I wonder if it ought not to be an order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair leave to print on a matter extraneous to that under discussion should not be brought up in the Committee of the Whole, but in the House. The opinion of the Chair is that the better course would be to make the request in the House.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that this is part of the general debate, and to general debate anything and everything is relevant, and therefore the committee may act in the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but this was on a subject different from that under discussion to-day, although it is true that in the discussion of this subject the gentleman from West Virginia made a speech.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I desire to make a few remarks with reference to deficiency appropriations. The late Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Aldrich, once startled the country by a statement to the effect that the Government could be run at an expense not exceeding $300,000,000 a year. In view of that statement it is remarkable that in peace time, within five months after the beginning of this fiscal year, the President has submitted to us estimates for deficiency appropriations amounting to $315,000,000, a sum in excess of that which the late Senator from Rhode Island believed should be the total expenditures of this Government.

Now there is no justification for a deficiency—

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am sorry I can not. I have but 10 minutes.

I say, there is no justification for a deficiency unless, first, Congress failed to provide sufficient funds to carry on the activities of the Government; or, second, after the passage of the annual appropriation bills it had authorized new activities. In either case it is impossible for us to satisfactorily explain the necessity for the President submitting deficiency estimates for the first five months of the fiscal year amounting to $315,000,000.

I sometimes think of what would have happened six months ago if these estimates had been submitted. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], I know, would have come in here and stated, "A few months ago an estimate was submitted by the Democratic administration for $125,000,000; we appropriated only $50,000,000, and therefore we have saved the taxpayers $75,000,000. And now the Executive of this willfully extravagant Democratic administration asks for $190,000,000, and we have recommended only $103,000,000, thereby saving to the taxpayers $87,000,000."

It is wonderful how times have changed. We no longer hear this argument of saving money by cutting down estimates. Now, the Director of the Budget, Gen. Dawes, is proceeding to save along new lines. He saves his in the newspapers instead of in the House. [Laughter.] It is an idle day when he can not save a few millions there. But he has not only deceived the people but apparently he has misled our good President, who has no opportunity to examine into these things, into believing that millions will be saved this year. Therefore when the President submitted this estimate for $190,000,000, he submitted a statement which I assume was prepared by Mr. Dawes, in which he did not call attention to the fact that they were going to touch the taxpayers for $190,000,000, but only called attention to the wonderful savings that were being made while asking us for $190,000,000. Of course, I propose to remind you from time to time about the savings of this Budget Bureau.

The leader of the House, jealous of Mr. Dawes, told us they were going to save $350,000,000 just a month or two ago, and now they come and ask for $190,000,000. What is the use in having a Budget Bureau? I understood they were going to help us save money. A few months ago they asked for the Shipping Board $75,000,000 more than we gave them, and the Shipping Board is doing well without that $75,000,000.

Now the Budget Bureau, with the approval of the President, asks for $90,000,000 more than this committee recommends; and in the interest of the taxpayers we should abolish it and allow the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who seems sincerely anxious to cut down appropriations, to act as the budget officer of this Government.

But I want to comment for a minute upon the saving you were going to make; because the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said you were going to make those savings, and when he says so you have to believe it. He told the President you were going to save $350,000,000 out of the appropriations for this year. He said that you were going to save $100,000,000 in the Navy. But the Navy asked for $27,000,000 in the way of a deficiency. Then they withdrew the estimate and said they would try and see if they could not reduce it by the time the regular session met in December.

The gentleman from Wyoming stated he was going to save $25,000,000 out of the appropriations for the Agricultural Department when the total appropriation was only $36,000,000. When I called attention to that, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] stated that it was to be saved out of the road fund; but you know—and the country ought to know that instead of saving money out of the road fund since that time we have appropriated $100,000,000 to be spent in cooperation with the States in building public roads. So that instead of saving $25,000,000, we have appropriated an additional $100,000,000 since that time. Now as business men, how can we reconcile those statements? The gentleman from Wyoming said that in the Navy Department we would save $100,000,000. The total amount appropriated on the building contracts was only $90,000,000, and if this conference on the limitation of armament is a success and we cancel the contracts, we all know that we have got to pay damages in addition to the amounts already spent, and there is not a chance on earth of saving $100,000,000 in the Navy appropriations. On the contrary the department asked for $27,000,000 deficiency appropriations.

I call attention to this because I make the prediction now that we will have at least two or three more deficiency bills, and unless there is a great change in the executive departments the deficiency bills of this Congress are going to amount to almost as much as any Congress prior to 1908 ever spent for all governmental purposes.

This is the first time I have had occasion to say something about the War Veterans' Bureau, and I want to say a few words about it. Everybody else wants to say something about it. There can be nothing partisan in it. It has been wretchedly administered from the day it was organized. The only thing

I have to say about it is that it goes from bad to worse. I base that statement on my own experience. I have come to the conclusion that while we complain rightfully about the extravagances of that bureau, at the same time the boys whom we have tried to help are not being helped as they should be. I can not defend that bureau to the soldiers of my district when they come and tell me that they are unable even to receive an answer to a communication.

When I went home in September I had one boy make such a statement to me. I wrote the bureau on September 28 inquiring as to the status of a soldier's claim for compensation, and I never received an acknowledgment of my letter until yesterday morning, after having a talk over the phone with the director on Saturday. I had written two or three times, and finally wrote to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, asking him if he could advise me how I could receive an acknowledgment of a communication trying to ascertain the status of the claim of a boy for compensation. Every time I have to write a letter to that bureau or you have to write a letter to that bureau it is a condemnation of the bureau, because a soldier boy ought to be able to secure action upon his requests without enlisting the aid of a United States Congressman. When these gentlemen say it costs $10 to spend $99 it is not accurate, for in addition to that $10 which is spent by the Government you and I know that many of these boys go and employ lawyers in order to try to get action upon their claims, and then your time and the time of your secretary is demanded in order to secure consideration for the ex-service men. If we had an accurate estimate of the amount of money that is actually being spent, not only by the Government, but by all parties to the transaction, it would be found that it costs almost a dollar for every dollar spent. I have no criticism to make of the good gentleman who is now in charge of it. I never saw him; but if he is going to accomplish anything he ought to have a shake-up of the bureau and discharge the people who have been there who have demonstrated their incapacity and have developed a faculty for losing papers—that is unparalleled in human history. If we should ever find all the papers that have been lost by the War Risk Bureau, no building in the city of Washington would be big enough to hold them. [Laughter.] You can ask about any case, and they will tell you they have lost the papers. I had a chap who had a letter addressed to him by the bureau authorizing him to go to a dental clinic in Philadelphia in September for treatment. He had left Philadelphia and had moved to South Carolina. He wanted to have his authorization transferred there. Up to this date he can not secure a transfer. The only way he could go to the Philadelphia dental clinic would be to get on a train and go back to Philadelphia at great expense. A few days ago my secretary visited the bureau and presented the officials with an authorization to a clinic in Philadelphia, and asked them to transfer it to a clinic near the home of the boy, and was informed "We must have the papers." I could have told them before they started to look that they never would find them, because that has been my experience. After some time the official stated the papers could not be found. When I asked them on the face of that letter to grant the transfer, they said they could not do it; that they must have the original papers. If the original authorization was justified, why not transfer it? The result is that these boys have come to the conclusion that they can not get an answer to a communication or action upon a claim unless they get the help of a Congressman, and if that is true and you can get something done for a boy that he can not get done for himself, it is unfair and unjust to the boy who does not come to a Congressman. [Applause.]

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ] be permitted to extend his remarks made a few minutes ago by reinserting in the Record his remarks made on November 14, and that these remarks be reprinted in regular eight-point Record type.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is made on behalf of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ] that he be authorized to insert in the Record as an extension of his remarks made to-day the remarks made by him on November 14, and that the same be printed in regular Record type. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I want to direct the attention of Members to page 24 of the bill, lines 11 and 12. Read lines 7 to 12, they are as follows:

For refunding taxes illegally collected under the provisions of sections 3220 and 3689, Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of February 24, 1919, for claims accruing as follows:

Prior to July 1, 1920, $12,422,000;

During the fiscal year 1921, $10,635,000.

Note, if you please, the reference to the act of February 24, 1919. The date is significant, and in the extension of my remarks I shall go more into detail with regard to that point. That is the basis on which a change was made in refunding taxes illegally collected; that is, internal-revenue tax. Prior to that time they were refunded out of the permanent indefinite appropriations. Here is the change to annual appropriations.

I chanced to meet this item about two years ago when I was tracing out a delayed refund of taxes illegally collected. Upon a discussion with the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants I called attention to the possibility of duplication by the proposed method. Again, when the legislative bill was under consideration in the last session of Congress I called attention to the same point of possible duplication in connection with the payment of these taxes. What now has been the result? Have these duplications occurred? To that I answer yes. In what amounts? For the month of September last they aggregated something like $30,000 and from month to month like duplications have appeared.

I hold in my hand copies of official letters citing these cases, and in one instance I am informed there were on the desk in the Treasury Department on one day warrants amounting to $100,000 issued in duplicate payments. If I had the time I would like to spread these facts before each Member of the House, but time will not permit. Here is a proposition that is not covered by the hearings. I read with care the statements of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Blair, and his deputy, Mr. West, and not one word was uttered in regard to this matter of duplications. Do they intend to conceal them? Let the books be opened. Turn on the light.

Now, there is the point where inefficiency appears in respect to this new method of procedure. Now, let me emphasize this point. No doubt every Member of the House has been appealed to from time to time to expedite the refund of taxes paid in excess. These letters show that the bureau takes from one to four years to pass upon a refund of money paid in excess. To my mind that is an imposition upon the taxpayers of the country. If there is any one class of settlements that ought to be promptly made and the money returned promptly it is the payment of money that the people have put on deposit in the Treasury Department in excess of the amount they legally owe the Government. But there seems to have been a practice running through an extended period of years, not simply under one administration or the administration of one political party but through all of them where that evil has been continued.

Line 11 of this bill reads as follows: "Prior to July 1, 1920, $12,422,000." What does this really mean? It means that the bureau is now holding in its possession $12,422,000 of excess payments which were made by taxpayers over 18 months ago. It means that the Bureau of Internal Revenue has allowed those claims to rest in the pigeon holes and elsewhere during that period of time. Does that not prove carelessness and maladministration on the part of the Bureau of Internal Revenue? What stronger evidence do we need upon that point?

Consider for a moment the gross impositions that are thus forced upon the taxpayers of the country by such dilatory methods. Congress made appropriations for the employment of clerks to transact that business promptly. Your mail and mine reveal the hardships that many taxpayers are compelled to endure through such negligence and maladministration.

Should the Committee on Appropriations not take hold of the persons responsible for such delays and duplications and shake them out of their boots and out of their places in the department? Moreover, is it not the duty of Commissioner Blair to lead the way in the matter of house cleaning, especially with respect to taxes illegally collected? Has he the courage to go forward and discharge his duty in this respect or have the old-timers hypnotized him into their ways of thinking and acting?

The number of claims for taxes illegally collected approximates 75,000 a year. Thus far the commissioner has declined to give the exact number of such claims received and settled annually. It should be observed that the duplications to which I have referred include only the warrants that are voluntarily returned by those to whom they were issued. The taxpayers returning such warrants have suggested that they were duplicate payments and they did not consider themselves entitled to their retention. They were honest enough to help the Government save some money that the Bureau of Internal Revenue was spreading broadcast without warrant of law. But how many have cashed their duplicate warrants without ever mentioning the matter to the department? How can we ever obtain the real facts in relation to this matter? Only by making a careful review of the refund claims passed upon under the provisions of the act of February 4, 1919. Could such duplication have been avoided?

Certainly. How? By checking every refund claim back against the assessment list where each item of debit and credit would be posted, as it were, in regular form.

Thus it may be noted in passing that nothing but inefficiency, negligence, and maladministration can be regarded as responsible for these mistakes. Who are the people that committed them? It is the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to find out and administer proper discipline. Has he the courage to do so? Or have the old-timers who perpetrated these wrongs hypnotized him to their method of thinking and acting?

It is sometimes whispered gently that we should not mention these things at this time because the Republicans have just taken control. To my mind that is a valid reason for immediate action. Concealment at this time should not be a part of the Republican policy. A prompt disclosure of actual facts alone can justify Republican officials. It is the imperative duty of the Republican leaders of this House and of the administrative branches of the public service to open the books immediately, turn on the light, and clean house.

Perhaps it will be said that the Bureau of Internal Revenue does not have adequate clerical force. What are the facts? Official reports indicate that on July 1, 1913, the number of employees in the Internal Revenue Bureau in Washington was 277; on July 1, 1921, the number was 7,096. The pay roll on July 1, 1913, aggregated $357,239, and on July 1, 1921, it totaled $11,582,550. The number paid from lump-sum appropriations on July 1, 1913, none; on July 1, 1921, it was 6,571. On July 1, 1913, the number receiving salaries of $2,000 and over was 17, while on July 1, 1921, it was 1,789.

Please note the fact that these figures relate to the Bureau of Internal Revenue in Washington alone.

At a later date I shall present some figures and facts relating to the personnel and salaries in this branch of the public service. Those facts and figures will prove that McAdoo outdid his railroad business when he boosted salaries in the Internal Revenue Bureau. While the great bulk of the clerks in the executive branches of the service received an increase during the war period of only $240 per year, many of the favored ones in the Bureau of Internal Revenue had their salaries more than doubled, thus making that bureau the great disorganizing agency in the executive departments of the Government in Washington.

Repeat the demand again and again—

Open the books, turn on the light, clean house.

Does Commissioner Blair have the courage to lead the way in this house-cleaning business or will he urge increased salaries as a reward for negligence and maladministration? Let the future answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

[Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska had leave to extend his remarks.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire before discussing anything relating to the bill to discuss one or two other matters that I think the attention of the House should be directed to. All of you, I think, are receiving a great many letters with regard to the continuation of the publication of certain Government publications, especially the Labor Review. I want to state the situation as to that. We placed a provision in an appropriation bill last spring which provided that no publication should be continued after the 1st day of the coming December except such as was specifically authorized by law. There are about 120 Government publications being issued here. I understand something like 25 are authorized by law by special statute, and about 90 or 95 will be cut off the 1st day of December unless Congress takes some action. Amongst them is the Labor Review, which I think every Member of Congress has heard about. Under proceedings taken by the Printing Committee we have already cut off 111 publications, affecting a saving of between one and two million dollars a year. The Senate has passed a resolution providing for the continuation of these publications under certain conditions. The House Committee on Printing reported that bill amended so as to provide that the publications should be continued until the 1st day of next March, and in the meanwhile we propose to hold hearings to determine whether or not these publications or each of them shall be continued and which shall not. By that time we shall be able to decide which shall be continued and have them authorized by law.

Now, that resolution has been reported and is on the calendar and has been on the calendar since the 19th of this month. Without action these publications will automatically stop on the 1st day of December, and a great deal of inconvenience is going to be suffered as a result of it. I am a minority member of the Committee on Printing, but I voted with the majority to report the bill, and I hope to see some provision made for calling it up and passing it before Congress adjourns to-morrow night.

There is another bill of vast importance to the people of this country which was reported to this House by unanimous vote by the Banking and Currency Committee on the 26th day of October and authority given to the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee to ask for a rule to have it passed if necessary. Up to the 31st day of October a loan from a national bank secured by United States Liberty bonds could exceed 10 per cent of the capital and surplus of the bank. In other words, the 10 per cent limit would not apply to a loan secured by Liberty bonds. The period expired on the 31st of October.

The Senate has passed a bill extending it for 12 months. The House committee has unanimously reported that bill and authorized the chairman to apply for a rule to have it passed so as to extend that time to the 31st day of October, 1922. It has been on the calendar since the 26th of October, and we of the Banking and Currency Committee are anxious to know what has become of the chairman and why the matter has not been called up and passed.

Liberty bonds are now going up toward par. They have gone up from 87 to 95 during the last two or three months. There are millions and millions of them that are up under these excess loans. Men have been struggling to carry them, paying the interest, trying to hold them until they reach par. These loans are now being called, and in the next 60 days every loan will be called, and will be called because there has been no action taken here for more than two weeks, nearly four weeks, on this proposition. I want to place on record my protest against the negligence of the managers who leave that bill hanging over until the men who are striving to hold their securities until they reach par have lost them. They paid for them at par, because in order to have excess loans the bonds had to be bought at par, and they are the people who took them when the country was under stress. I say it is an outrage not to extend this time until they reach par, and by your inaction cause them to be sacrificed by being called.

There is one other thing I want to discuss for a moment. Congress passed a bill extending the emergency tariff the other day. We were appealed to from the South to vote for it because it put a tariff on Egyptian cotton. I want to call attention to a few figures to show the fraud of that whole proposition. Twelve months ago there was no tariff on Egyptian cotton at all, and there were imported into this country in the month of October, 1920, when there was no tariff, 12 bales of 500 pounds each. In this good year of 1921, with a tariff of 7 cents a pound upon Egyptian cotton, there were imported during the month of October 18,972 bales. It does not look as if a tariff like that is a benefit here, in so far as preventing competition with us is concerned. It is a matter of 12 bales in one year as against 18,972 in another year, in the same month. No, Mr. Chairman, the tariff had nothing to do with it. It is a question of the condition of trade that has had to do with it. We compete with the world in making and selling and buying cotton. Then there is one other thing that has caused it. Some of the bigger factories in my district spin Egyptian solely. They import thousands of bales and they pay 7 cents a pound tax upon it. Take a bale of cotton that has a tax of 7 cents a pound and it means $35 tax. They spin this cotton into goods and then export the goods, and when they export the goods they get 99 per cent of the tax back, and they are out only 1 per cent.

Thirty-five dollars on a bale means 35 cents of it that is really paid in tariff tax when they get through with it. That is the whole thing in a nutshell. Therefore you see it has had absolutely no effect and never has had.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the gentleman think that placing a tariff upon this cotton has stimulated importations?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; I say that it did not either stimulate or restrict them. I direct attention to these figures to show that it did not do either, but that the drawback feature of the tariff allows a man who spins the cotton to manufacture to import it at his will, and then when he spins it to export it and draw back 99 per cent of the tax that he has paid. It merely means that he has loaned the Government $35 a bale for about 60 days.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. Are we not operating under the Underwood tariff law at present?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; so far as Egyptian cotton is concerned we are operating under the emergency tariff law which was passed by the gentleman's party last December, putting a 7 cents a pound tax on cotton, and under it in October of this year we imported 18,972 bales as against 12 bales imported during the same month last year.

Mr. CROWTHER. Is the gentleman sure that the drawback is allowed on manufactured products, the finished product, from the raw material?

Mr. STEVENSON. To be sure I am. That has been written into every tariff law since the Walker tariff in 1848. And it is testimony to the fact that the tariff is written for the manufacturer and not for the farmer or the producer of the raw material.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I intend to again present the question of political amnesty. I have not enough time granted me to take it up properly. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein a memorial submitted to the President of the United States a few days ago by a number of prominent citizens, and two additional memorials submitted to him by veterans of the World War.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of certain memorials presented to the President of the United States. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, we do not usually print memorials in the RECORD. If they are presented to the Congress, they are dropped in the basket. If they are presented to the President of the United States, we very seldom put them in the RECORD, and I do not think the gentleman ought to ask us to depart from the usual procedure.

Mr. LONDON. I appreciate the force of the gentleman's objection, but petitions bearing more than a million names have been signed and Congress has not had any notice of it. One of these memorials is signed by 20 of the most prominent writers and publishers, including among them William Allen White—

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I have seen reference to it in the newspapers, but notwithstanding the prominence of these gentlemen, I doubt if we should print them.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, the first memorial reads as follows:

Sir: We appear before you to ask for immediate pardon of all persons convicted under the espionage act and other war laws.

According to our information there are confined in various Federal prisons 147 men serving sentences, some of which run as high as 20 years. All of these men were convicted of practically the same supposed offense, namely, of written or spoken opposition to the war or of using language construed by the courts to be in opposition to the war.

None of these men were convicted of offenses involving moral turpitude in its generally accepted sense. None of them were guilty of overt acts against the law. Not one was shown to have the remotest connection with enemy governments or agents. The only charge against them was the mere expression of opinion or the espousal of an unpopular political or industrial philosophy. Many of them are men of the highest character whose lives have been devoted to self-sacrificing efforts for the betterment of humanity.

Freedom of expression is fundamental to the institutions of American liberty. Whatever may have been demanded by the exigencies of war, hostilities, in fact, ceased three years ago. Treaties with our recent enemies have been ratified, and peace has been formally proclaimed by you. There no longer exists the slightest justification for the continued incarceration of these men.

AMNESTY IS ONLY WAY.

Only in the United States are such political prisoners still confined. Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, and Canada have released political offenders of this character. Adherence to our democratic traditions and ideals demands that we follow the example of our recent allies. The continued imprisonment of these men is a grave reflection upon our cherished freedom of expression and a reproach to our sense of justice, particularly since we long ago liberated active enemy agents, such as Von Rintelen and others who bombed ships and committed crimes of the most serious nature.

Only an act of general amnesty can approximate justice in these cases. All of them are substantially the same. The policy of reviewing individual cases opens the way for discrimination, prejudice, and the exercise of personal judgment by subordinate officers of the Government and for that reason is unsound and fundamentally unjust.

We note a tendency to distinguish Eugene V. Debs among these cases because of his prominence, his extraordinary character, and the large following he has throughout the country. Executive clemency for Mr. Debs without at the same time extending it to others convicted of similar offenses would be as distasteful to him as it would be unfair to the others. Mr. Debs has repeatedly made this clear. He wants no pardon that is not extended equally to others in the same position.

Those who believe that a general amnesty is an act of simple justice long overdue have waited patiently through the successive stages of the actual termination of hostilities, the passage of the congressional resolution ending the war, the ratification of the peace treaties, and your own formal proclamation of peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the balance of this memorial that I have just read—of this one memorial?

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I object to that.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS].

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] has referred to some of the troubles of the majority side of this House. I want to say to the gentleman that, in my opinion, many of those troubles are inherited from the former Democratic misrule. We are reaping a whirlwind. And the same statement in a measure is true of the bureau being discussed at this time, the Veterans' Bureau. In my opinion a brainy, big-hearted, efficient man, Col. Forbes, is in charge of that bureau now, and if you will hold up his hands and back him up and give him support, as I know the chairman of this committee will, he will bring order out of that chaos down there and will eliminate the troubles of the bureau. He is working long hours, night and day—I fear at the expense of his health—to bring this to pass.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have not had the experience with that bureau such as some of the gentlemen have referred to here to-day. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNS] said that he waited months for an answer to a letter and that he wrote to the bureau time after time. Now, that is not my experience. That may be the exception to the rule, and the exception, you know, very often proves the rule. I have had very prompt, intelligent responses from the bureau.

I want to give what is another exception, perhaps, but it illustrates some of the services I have received from the Veterans' Bureau. The case of a young man from my district was filed in my office. I received this case on Thursday morning, and on Saturday afternoon at 4.30 he had been adjudged a permanent total case and had been awarded $100 per month from date of discharge and insurance in the sum of $57.50 per month payable from date disability was incurred, which was several months prior to discharge.

This may be an exception to the rule. But the rule, I think, and the intent and the idea of the management of the Veterans' Bureau to-day is to give service. I know Col. Forbes well enough to know that he is working almost night and day to bring order in that bureau and give the country the best service possible.

Mr. STEPHENS. I was going to ask if the colonel attends to this particular business himself? Is it not your opinion that there is a good deal of inefficiency in the men who are employed to investigate these particular cases?

Mr. CHALMERS. That may be.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have had two particular cases that showed absolute inefficiency, but I do not hold it against the head of the bureau.

Mr. CHALMERS. I do not doubt there will be exceptional cases, but—

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I want to ask you if you have not received letters from lots of ex-service men in your district advising you that they have been unable to get a reply from the bureau?

Mr. CHALMERS. Not a very large number of such letters. I have received a few. I want to say in regard to the large number of papers that may be lost in the bureau, referred to by the gentleman from South Carolina, that I believe the percentage is very small and that when you consider the tens of millions of letters, reports, affidavits, and other papers on file in the Veterans' Bureau that you will find the number of pieces of mail that are lost is very low in comparison with the total.

I am just stating my own experience with the Veterans' Bureau, and I think I am describing the experiences of many of my colleagues. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that we proceed with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Legislative. House of Representatives.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: On page 2, after line 2, insert: "To pay the widow of Samuel W. Taylor, late a Representative from the State of Arkansas, $7,500, to be disbursed by the Sergeant at Arms of the House."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment to C. B. Kennamer for expenses incurred as contestant in the contested-election case of Kennamer v. Rainey, audited and recommended by the Committee on Elections No. 3, $2,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at the end of that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: On page 2, after line 6, insert: "For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, fiscal year 1921, $7,254.81."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in this connection that this amendment was authorized to be offered by the committee, but it came in too late for the committee to insert it in the bill. It refers to telegraph and telephone bills rendered in 1921 which had not been audited in time to be inserted in the bill or to be paid during the year in which they were contracted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, so as to place myself on firm parliamentary ground. I am opposed to paying the various congressional committees because they overlooked one of the most important questions pending before the committee.

This question has been well presented to the President of the United States in a memorial to which I made reference, and which I was not in a position to finish reading before. I continue reading the memorial:

We come to you confident that you will appreciate the fairness and wisdom of declaring an immediate general amnesty.

TIME IS OPPORTUNE.

It is particularly appropriate that you grant amnesty at this time. The passions of war have passed. The nations of the world are gathered in conference in the hope of ending war forever.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the discussion of the gentleman is not germane to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that a liberal rule has usually been observed in that regard. Unless the privilege is abused the Chair does not feel like ruling.

Mr. ROSSDALE. It is clearly not germane to the amendment.

Mr. LONDON. I read further:

These men in whose behalf we speak voiced in time of war sentiments which now are freely expressed. The truest traditions of our country call for their immediate release. We urge amnesty not only in behalf of these individuals but in vindication of an everlasting principle.

Respectfully, yours,

William Allen White, Emporia, Kans.; Rev. Dr. John Ryan, Catholic University, Washington, D. C.; Fred Hewitt, International Association of Machinists; William F. Cochran, Baltimore; Rev. Mercer Green Johnston, Baltimore; George M. Lamonte, New Jersey; Rev. Beverly Dangerfield Tucker, Jr., Virginia; Oswald Garrison Villard, New York; John S. Codman, Boston; Gen. W. H. Baxby, Washington, D. C.; Albert De Silver, New York; Miss Julia Lathrop, Washington, D. C.; Miss Elizabeth Gilman, Baltimore; Mrs. Mercer G. Johnston, Baltimore; Mrs. Francis Lillie, Chicago; Mrs. Emily Chadbourne, New York; Mrs. Walter Weyl, Chicago; Mrs. Laura Williams, Washington, D. C.; Mrs. Marguerite Tucker, San Francisco; Mrs. Charles Edward Russell, Washington, D. C.

That completes the memorial submitted by the authors and publishers. Two additional memorials have been submitted, to which I made reference. One was by the World War Veterans, an organization of 400,000 men, and a separate memorial by four men who have received the congressional medal of honor. Their names are Clayton K. Stark, of Lampson, Wis.; John J. Kelly, of Chicago, Ill.; George H. Mallon, of Minneapolis, Minn.; and Berger Loman, of Chicago, Ill.

I do not think I shall have time to read the other two memorials in full. On reflection, inasmuch as the various committees for which appropriations are asked have performed their work in good faith and are entitled to some compensation, I withdraw my opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For remodeling and reequipment of the restaurant of the House, including reimbursement of the appropriation "Capitol Building and repairs, 1922," for expenditures on this account, $20,591.94.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I most heartily approve this appropriation for the remodeling of the Capitol restaurant. I suppose it applies to the one here and the one in the House Office Building. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he can assure us that at an early date we can really have a clean, up-to-date, respectable eating place for the convenience of the Members of the House and their friends?

Mr. MADDEN. We have the word of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts and that of the architect of the Capitol that the work will soon be completed, and that the cost would not be anything like what it will if it were not for the fact that it was found necessary to reconstruct the sewerage system. In about three or four weeks the Members of the House may hope to have an entirely new equipment, new linen, new silver, better service, better food, and cleaner conditions than they ever had before.

Mr. SNELL. I want to compliment the committee in having this done. I think it will meet with the unanimous approval of the Members of the House, because everyone, I know, is in favor of having a clean and respectable place there.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out lines 11, 12, 13, and 14 on page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKS of Arkansas: "Page 2, strike out all of lines 11 to 14, inclusive."

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the committee that if I am correctly informed, this $20,591.94 is in addition to $30,000 that has already been spent on the kitchen in this building, and yet nothing has been spent on the kitchen and dining room in the House Office Building, and more money will be provided for the dining room over there. When it was originally brought in here, I understood the estimate had been made by the engineers and the architect who have had charge of it that $30,000 would not only repair or patch up this kitchen, but it would equip the dining room for the House in the Capitol and also the one in the House Office Building. We have spent $30,000 in order to provide a place for 435 men to eat. The committee has come in with an item of more than $24,000 to further beautify and furnish a dining room in this building for the accommodation of the Members of the House. At the same time there has been brought in from the Committee on Accounts an additional resolution to appropriate $25,000 to equip another dining room for the exclusive use of the Members of this House; and if $30,000 will not provide a comfortable, decent, clean, sanitary, and pleasant place for the Members of this House to get their lunch once a day, it seems to me that in the interest of economy and common sense we ought to shut up that dining room and eat in the dining room over in the House Office Building or over in the Senate or somewhere else. I do not believe the House ought to continue an expenditure until, with the appropriations now in contemplation, we will have spent the enormous sum of $75,000 to provide a place for the Members of the House of Representatives to eat their lunch once a day. I do not believe that it is justified or that it ought to be done. It may be a small matter, but I can not give my consent to such extravagance, and I hope the amendment I offer will be adopted.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say in this connection that this item is in addition to the appropriation already made of $30,000. In justification of the present recommendation I wish also to say that $5,000 was spent for overtime work due to the necessity of working nights and Sundays on the restaurant and kitchen and other parts of the work. It was necessary to expend $3,000 on account of the condition of the sewerage, which made the place insanitary. Thirty-six hundred dollars was expended on account of chairs that were not contemplated in the original estimate, and $3,800 on account of wainscoting proposed to be put into the tiling in the kitchen, so as to make it strictly clean and sanitary. If there ever was an expenditure that is justified, my judgment is that this is.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PARKS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PARKS of Arkansas) there were—ayes 16, noes 59.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted to change the totals and make the necessary corrections in the aggregate of the amount finally agreed upon—all the totals in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that the Clerk be given general authority to correct the figures of the bill made necessary by the insertion of amendments. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOARD OF MEDIATION AND CONCILIATION.

For all necessary expenses in connection with closing up the business of the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation, including payment of salaries of the Commission of Mediation and Conciliation, the Assistant Commissioner of Mediation and Conciliation, and employees of the board, and all other outstanding indebtedness incurred by the board during the fiscal year 1922; and the inventory of the property and records of the board and their delivery to the proper department of the Government, $6,650.

Mr. WATSON. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what is the value of the furniture to be inventoried?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know. It consists of the furniture in the office and the records of the previous administrations. This Board of Mediation and Conciliation have been in office since 1913. When they came into office all the records of the Commissioner of Labor prior to that time were turned over to them under the Erdmann Act. Since they have been in office they have acted in a great many cases and adjusted a great many labor troubles. They have there many valuable records which ought to be maintained and preserved in an orderly fashion. The commissioner and his assistants have been occupying their offices under the law since the beginning of last July without any pay. No appropriation for their services was made in the last annual appropriation bill. Since that time the chairman of the commission has been paying the clerical force out of his own pocket. This proposes to let that board go out of office in an orderly, respectable way by paying them what is coming to them and then closing up shop. We are here preventing the continuation of an expenditure which we think to be no longer necessary.

Mr. WATSON. Of course, I recognize the importance of keeping the records, but I want to know the value of the furniture.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the furniture is of much value. It consists of a few chairs and desks.

Mr. WATSON. An official appeared before a committee in executive session and stated that there was $750,000 worth of furniture—

Mr. MADDEN. Where?

Mr. WATSON. Stored in the various warehouses in Washington. During the Democratic administration there were 50 temporary commissions formed. This is the beginning of closing them.

Mr. MADDEN. This is not a temporary commission.

Mr. WATSON. It is one that is to be closed up, and you must dispose of the furniture. When you close the other 50 temporary bureaus and commissions there will be thousands of dollars worth of furniture. I remember that for every bureau that was established we appropriated a large sum for the furniture. What is to become of the $750,000 worth of furniture and the other furniture that is going to be stored?

Mr. MADDEN. It is all put under control of the General Supply Committee, which has an inventory of it, and which from time to time sells it to any department that may need it. We have already provided in every law regarding the expenditure of money from the Public Treasury that every branch of the Government service requiring supplies within the control of this supply committee shall obtain those supplies from that committee instead of going outside.

Mr. WATSON. Then every time a commission is established and an appropriation is made for the purpose of buying furniture that appropriation must be used for the buying of this furniture that is in storage?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. That was not the statement made by the official, because he said he was obliged to buy new furniture. I wondered why he should be obliged to buy other furniture when there is $750,000 worth of furniture in storage.

Mr. MADDEN. He made a mistake.

Mr. WATSON. I think it is right that the taxpayers should know what becomes of the furniture in storage.

Mr. MADDEN. It is all being provided for in that way.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. What particular bureau or board is going to take up the work of this Board of Mediation and Conciliation?

Mr. MADDEN. The Railway Labor Board. This Board of Mediation and Conciliation was exclusively a railway proposition.

Mr. HAYDEN. I understood that the Board of Mediation and Conciliation settled labor questions outside of the railroads.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is, no doubt, thinking of the conciliators in the Department of Labor. This was an independent board created by law in 1913, and had to do only with the conciliation of railroad labor problems. The other thing has nothing to do with this item at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

For all other authorized expenditures necessary in the execution of laws to regulate commerce, and to take care of additional duties placed upon the commission by the transportation act, 1920, $300,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like some explanation by the chairman of the committee as to the additional duties placed on the commission by the transportation act that requires an additional appropriation of $300,000.

Mr. MADDEN. The allocation of equipment under the railroad act, the loans that they were authorized to make, the renting of equipment, and that part of the act which guaranteed the income for six months, and all the elements that entered into the railroad act.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then it is for clerical and professional services?

Mr. MADDEN. It is on account of the additional duties imposed upon the commission by the railroad act—the duties I have enumerated. The Interstate Commerce Commission was authorized to buy equipment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What sort of equipment?

Mr. MADDEN. Railroad equipment—rolling stock—and lease this equipment to the weaker roads; to allocate equipment to the roads where the need of equipment might exist, and to do various other things; to loan money to roads under certain conditions, and also the installation of train-control devices.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do I understand that the Interstate Commerce Commission has authority to buy equipment for railroads?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; where the weaker railroads are unable to buy the equipment themselves, the Interstate Commerce Commission buys it and leases it to those roads. It has authority to loan them money and authority to fix the rate of interest and decide whether it is proper to make the loans and whether the security is sufficient.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. They also have the important duty of passing upon security of all kinds. They must approve every stock and bond issue.

Mr. STEVENSON. According to my recollection, the transportation act provides that this is to be paid for out of the equipment fund.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but that involves a certain amount of work.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the increased clerical service.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; the administration service that is imposed upon them.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman used the term "guarantee to the railroads." I am under the impression that the guaranty—

Mr. MADDEN. I referred to the six-month guaranty.

Mr. BEGG. I think that should be made specific.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, United States Veterans' Bureau, $65,000,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask why this hospitalization should not be divorced from the Public Health Service entirely? The chairman made a statement this morning, which I approve of cordially, that in the homes for disabled soldiers men were kept and kept splendidly for about one-third of the cost per man that they are kept in the United States Public Health Service hospitals. I want to find out for my constituents why we do not go to that system. What reason is there for not having this independent service instead of keeping these men under the Public Health Service?

Mr. MADDEN. Let me say to the gentleman that my first knowledge of this situation came from an investigation which the committee made of facts in this connection. I reached the conclusion and set it out in my statement this morning which conforms very nearly to what the gentleman's views are, but I think it would be far better now not to undertake to divorce one from the other until we can work it out. The reason why we made a very large cut in the appropriation recommended for this activity was that we hoped to bring them back in a short time with the facts and ascertain the condition which will enable them to do this, and then we will work out a scheme or be able to force them to work out a scheme that will comply with what the gentleman and I have expressed. So I think it would be better to do no more to-day than to express our opposition to the present method, and after having expressed it to follow it up and force a proper condition in this service.

Mr. STEVENSON. The committee wants to look at all of the circumstances to see which way to go after you have given it consideration?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think it is only fair to say, in respect to this high per diem rate in the Public Health Service, that they took over hospitals all about the country and had to reinstate, to make extensive repairs, and put them in condition. I think that expense is included in the large per diem that the chairman gave this morning.

Mr. STEVENSON. There was some initial expense for plants?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes; and I think that ought to be stated, in fairness to the Public Health Service.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. It is also true that there is not sufficient bed capacity in the buildings under control of the soldiers' homes to meet the demands.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think that is true; and we can not start too soon if we are paying $7 in the hospitals of the Public Health Service and $2.50 in the soldiers' homes. We can not start too soon in getting enough equipment where we can save $5 a day.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The estimate furnished generally is $3,000 per bed, but we would spend more in building than we would in meeting the slightly increased expense. I agree with the gentleman fully that the Public Health Service ought to bring its service to a lower grade.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the position that I am contending for now.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And there is another consideration also, which is a partial explanation, I think, of the high per diem in the Public Health Service. These hospitals which they started up anew sometimes were not patronized immediately to their full capacity, so that you would have a large overhead very often at the beginning with only a few patients, and the per diem would necessarily run very high in those cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I have great respect for the judgment of both the gentleman from South Carolina and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and with no more facts than I have before me I would not undertake to hazard a suggestion to either one of them, except that the known facts would naturally appeal to the conservative position of each gentleman. For illustration, as I understand, the gentleman says there is a difference of $5 per day in the two services.

Mr. STEVENSON. That was a statement made by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] called attention to the extraordinary expense in building. If this new kitchen down here in the basement of the Capitol is a criterion, I am a little bit disheartened, because if we undertake to provide hospital equipment for the soldiers who need it, and gauge our expenditures on the basis that this little kitchen we have down here costs us, it will bankrupt the Government. Every one of these hospitals has to have a kitchen, and this little Republican kitchen down here, as I understand it, cost $55,000—I will ask the gentleman from Arkansas how much it cost?

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. About $75,000.

Mr. WINGO. Well, 35 and 20 makes 55, and just to be conservative I will say $55,000. Whoever heard of spending $55,000 on a kitchen? No one but this Republican administration would think of such absurd waste of money. Why, I can buy every kitchen in the district of my friend from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] for $55,000. In addition to that, we furnish these people down here with free lights, and free silver, and free linen, and good solid mahogany tables are placed down there for Congressmen to eat their lunches on once a day, and then each Congressman has to pay an extravagant price for what he gets. Who gets all this money? We do not get any service.

I do not want to quibble about little things, but I had hoped that we could have some sort of an arrangement by which we could get decent service; but it is a disgrace to this House that it spends $55,000 on a kitchen, and then we do not get any decent kind of service or good food. Oh, gentlemen may smile, but the people of this country are going to put their own construction upon it. Fifty-five thousand dollars for a kitchen, when you already have most of your equipment, including your dining-room equipment. Mind you, that is just the kitchen. Why, you can build most of the mansions in most of the districts with a kitchen, a dining room, a parlor, a sitting room, a den, and ample bedrooms and baths for less than $55,000 each. Yet you Republicans spend $55,000 on a scrub kitchen in a basement and get no food after you get through with it. But that is the way with it; that is typical of the boasted efficiency of the Republican Party. They can not get even a decent kitchen without wrecking the Treasury, much less take care of proper hospitalization of our soldiers. God pity us! We are getting back to normalcy all right. Gentlemen here who are old in the service will recollect the old days when such as this is typical of Republican administration. No Republican administration ever touched even a hencoop or a kitchen but that it afterwards called for a deficiency out of the Treasury to take care of it. If I had any assurance that this would be the end of that, I would not speak of a petty thing like a kitchen, even though it did cost $55,000; but I am disheartened when I think of the burden that is placed upon the backs of the taxpayers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How sad!

Mr. WINGO. My friend from Washington says, "How sad." It is sad, this wanton waste of public funds. It is interesting to hear gentlemen say that they can not spend any money by way of bonus to the soldiers, it is interesting to hear men complain of a railroad man getting $200 a month and risking his life, and at the same time seeing those men, as my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] would say, spending money like drunken sailors—$55,000 on a scrub kitchen. Where is the boasted efficiency and the boasted business management of the Republican Party? It can not even get itself a kitchen with any degree of satisfaction or economy; but waste, extravagance, and indifference to the taxpayers, except those of great wealth, are typical of this entire Republican administration.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The chairman of the committee compared the cost of the administration of the National Homes with the cost of the Public Health Service. Is the board of control that has control of the National Homes a governmental agency?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. So that really they are both Government agencies?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; only one is civilian and the other quasi military.

Mr. FESS. Is the work in the Health Service of sufficiently high grade to justify the heavy increase in cost?

Mr. MADDEN. The Managers of the National Home for Disabled Veterans would not admit that. They say that they manage their institutions the best in the world, and everyone who knows anything about the matter agrees with them. I do not say that the Public Health Service does not manage its institution well, or as well, but it manages it at excessively high cost.

Mr. FESS. The thing I wanted to make an observation about was that when the Government undertakes to do anything there seems to be a lack of concern in respect to the cost of it, just as if when the Government does it it does not cost anybody anything.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will allow me right there, the managers for the National Home for Disabled Soldiers before our committee claimed that their expenses had been materially increased because of the necessity for meeting the higher compensation allowed through the Public Health Service. For example, where they were paying $3,000 for a doctor and manager, which was considered ample, the other people are paying $6,000, and they in the National Homes have been compelled to go up somewhere near that standard.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, during the war, when we could not specify what the need of the personnel was and therefore could not limit the specific salaries, it seemed that everybody took advantage and began to increase salaries. I can understand how that would be done by a newly created Government agency, but the Public Health Service is an old agency, one that existed long before the war, and yet under stress, with the cost of doing things constantly increasing; and I believe the lump-sum appropriation is largely due to that—not so much to this particular agency of the Government as to a general rule that we followed during the war when we had not the facts that would enable us to designate what the salaries should be.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say for the information of the gentleman from Ohio and the Members of the House, the board in charge of the management of National Homes for Volunteer Soldiers serve without compensation. No one in the management gets compensation except the secretary of the board, and the president, I think, gets $4,000. But no other member of the board gets anything.

Mr. FESS. I think they ought to have a chromo. It is a rare service. My suggestion is that during the stress of war we have been increasing all along the cost of everything, and whether we are ever going to cut down or not is our problem.

Mr. MADDEN. We are going to try to bring it down.

Mr. FESS. We will help you.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last line.

Mr. Chairman, this matter of cost in hospitals for the soldiers was reviewed at considerable length by the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. We had before us the officers of the soldiers' homes; the officers of the Public Health Service; expert physicians from New York and Pennsylvania connected with different kinds of hospitals. All the way through the testimony showed that the expense in connection with the Public Health Service was the highest of all. I need not enter into a discussion of the details that were brought out in showing that fact.

Second, the hearings disclosed the fact that the expense in the soldiers' homes was lowest of all, and that in connection with the service in those homes there was not a word of valid complaint. In fact, the testimony showed in the main that in those homes they had really the best service of all. On that basis the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds decided to utilize the soldiers' homes to the utmost extent. Certain modifications were made in the regulations and in the law in order to remove certain minor objections that were presented by the soldiers of the World War and by others with reference to the military requirements formerly exacted. We were enlarging the plants at the different points, of the 10 different establishments of the homes. Where a hospital was needed for the enlarged work for the soldiers of the World War we built the hospital and thereby avoided the overhead charges, the additional expense for ground, sewerage, light, and everything of that sort, and a large unit was provided for, and on that basis we were utilizing the Government property, already owned by those homes, in which will gradually merge the care and treatment of the soldiers of the World War, not in such a way, however, as would deprive any of the ex-Union soldiers of their privileges and rights there, not giving to the soldiers of the World War any uncomfortable surroundings, but giving a unit for each, if you please, where conditions might call for it.

Now, in addition to that it was thought wise in some new hospital there should be specific provision made for the development of the highest possible skill for the treatment of mental troubles and also in some hospital there should be made provision for development of the highest possible skill in the treatment of tubercular cases. From all of these various institutions, in cases that were particularly severe and acute in the extreme, a transfer could be made to the institution where the best treatment could be furnished, but in the others arrangements would be made to utilize Government properties already owned, and enlarge them as conditions might require. On that basis we solved a large portion of this problem, meeting at least one-half of the demand in connection with the soldiers of the World War.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last section. I do that, Mr. Chairman, in order to get some information from the chairman of the committee on an item which has been passed or, rather, on the lack of an item which was estimated for but which was not included in the bill. I have reference to the estimates of the Interstate Commerce Commission of $36,000 for carrying out the provisions of the law with respect to the safety appliance act and the inspection of locomotive engines and boilers, and so forth. As the chairman and other Members of the House will recall, from time to time Congress has enacted legislation requiring the Interstate Commerce Commission to provide for the inspection of engines and boilers, and those laws have progressed to such an extent now that it is almost necessary to inspect the entire train and to make inspections and reports with reference to the loss of lives and injuries to people by reason of accidents or collisions on the railroads. Last year the commission was compelled to lay off some of its inspectors for a week or two weeks, and in some cases perhaps a month, in order to keep the expenses within the appropriation for the year, and of course to that extent there was lost motion and the service lost by reason of that hiatus. Since that time the transportation act has also placed upon the commission additional duties, and they have asked for an additional sum. What was the idea of the committee in refusing this appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. They could not use that for this purpose. There is an appropriation, however, of $313,600 to the credit of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the very activities referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky, and the committee's investigation led them to the conclusion that that was all the money they needed for this purpose.

Now, of course, it is easy enough for any commission or any department—and I am afraid that is their practice—at the beginning of the fiscal year never to look at the appropriation, but when they make their allotments, as the law requires them to do, of that appropriation, instead of making an allotment of the appropriation they make an allotment of their imaginary needs. The imaginary needs may be twice the appropriation, and they spend money according to their imaginary needs, and when they get to the middle of the year, of course they find they have got the whole appropriation for the entire year expended, and they come back for a deficiency. Now, the law in regard to deficiencies provides that no deficiencies shall be created, except in the Army and Navy for certain things.

It also provides that where the allotment is not made and they have gone on spending the money without regard to the amount of the appropriation, unless it is waived by the head of the department the person in charge is liable to be removed from office, he is liable to be fined and liable to be sent to prison for violation of the law, and it is because of our desire to make these department chiefs and bureau heads live up to the law that we have not made this appropriation. We have called the attention of every bureau chief and every head of a department that has come before us to the law, and we have said to them, "Although you have been violating the law in the past we are not going to join you in that violation of the law."

I want to say that Mr. McGinty, secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission—a very clever gentleman, by the way, bright and very able—admitted to us that he did not know there was any such law, and he admitted also that they had violated the law because they did not know about it. He also promised us that he never would violate it again; that he would live up to the law from now on.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think that is a very commendable resolution, but that really does not reach the question of providing the Interstate Commerce Commission with sufficient money to carry out this very efficient branch of the service. I do not think the Interstate Commerce Commission has been guilty of wasting any money in the inspection service.

Mr. MADDEN. It has been guilty of violating the law.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not believe the Interstate Commerce Commission has been guilty of waste in carrying on its work in the train-inspection service. They have not a very large force in comparison with the field which they have to cover, and I do not think the gentleman from Illinois will find that there has been any waste of money in that branch of their duties.

Mr. MADDEN. But they have admitted that they have violated the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. From time to time we have increased their duties, and in view of the fact that the commission has heretofore been rather conservative in its deficiency estimates, and in view of the fact that practically all that they have asked for has been given, it seems to me unfortunate that when we have increased their duties in this respect the committee has denied them what they consider is a sufficient amount of money to carry on this inspection service for the rest of the year.

Mr. MADDEN. The great mistake in the past has been that we have given them all they requested in the form of deficiencies. They have been getting it heretofore, but the time has come when they ought to be stopped getting it, like everybody else.

Mr. BARKLEY. The fact that the committee has heretofore given them what they asked and other departments have not received that consideration is proof of the fact that the committee has confidence in the good faith of the commission, and I think it is unfortunate that the committee has not given them this. The appropriation for the commission in the lump sum carried in the bill does not cover specifically the inspection service, and I fear this service will be crippled by lack of funds before the year is out. I regard this as very unfortunate. So far as this item is concerned, the committee has exercised economy at the wrong place.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Prevention of loss of timber from insect infestations on public lands in Oregon and California: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to prevent further loss of timber from insect infestations within the national forests and on other lands owned or administered by the United States in Oregon and California, $150,000, to remain available until December 31, 1922, of which sum not exceeding $90,000 shall be expended in cooperation with the Secretary of the Interior to prevent further loss of timber from insect infestations on Indian reservations, on lands title to which was vested in the United States by the act of June 9, 1916, and on unreserved public lands in Oregon and California: Provided, That no part of this appropriation, except necessary expenditures for preliminary investigations, shall be expended unless the States of Oregon and California, or the owners of pine timberland adjacent to or intermingled with lands owned or administered by the United States shall have satisfied the Secretary of Agriculture that the insect infestations on said adjacent and intermingled lands will be abated, in accordance with State law or voluntarily by the owners of such lands, to the extent necessary in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture to protect the timber on lands owned or administered by the United States from reinfestation.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LANHAM rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I have discussed this matter with the chairman privately, but I would like to have the chairman make a statement relative to the appropriation for treating tuberculosis in cattle.

Mr. LANHAM. That was a matter that I wished to inquire of the gentleman about.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The National Livestock Association, the Texas and southwestern cattle raisers, the largest cattle raisers' association in the world, and others have called the attention of Members to the fact that the appropriation for the treatment of tuberculosis in cattle is exhausted. In the State that I have the honor to represent in part the statement is made that there are 20,000 dairy cattle to which this inspection should be extended in that State. It is a very important matter, and I do not think that blame should attach to this committee or its chairman. I have had a conversation with him in private, and I would like to have the chairman state here on the floor why that deficiency has not been granted or placed in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. In common with many other Members of the House, including the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH], who has just spoken, I have had considerable correspondence with those who are interested in the live-stock industry of the United States. One gentleman who is a very warm personal friend of mine, who is the president of the Livestock Association, Mr. E. C. Brown, of Chicago, communicated with me two or three times and urged this appropriation very seriously. I wired him that there was but one way under the law in which to originate a deficiency, and that was for the Secretary of Agriculture to state to the Bureau of the Budget what his deficiency needs were, and to have the Bureau of the Budget agree with him and have the President submit the matter to us; that when that formula was complied with we would be very glad indeed to take the matter up for consideration. I stated to Mr. Brown that the Secretary of Agriculture had not submitted anything to us; that we were not asking the Secretary of Agriculture or any other head of a department to take money out of the Treasury; that our business was to keep them from taking it out; and that we could not consider a proposal that was not before us. I explained to him that it is not before us; that it has never been considered.

It could not get before us in any other way than that I have described, and although I have had no conversation whatever on the subject with the Secretary of Agriculture, I have written and replied to Mr. Brown and said to him that the Secretary of Agriculture had the remedy; it was in his hands; he could submit it. They had an appropriation last year for all they asked for this year in the regular annual appropriation bill. They got every dollar they asked. They spent the whole appropriation, if it is not there now, in four months. The Secretary said he does not need any more, so far as I understand; at any rate, he does not tell us that he needs any more. The result is that we have no remedy except to wait.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to ask the gentleman when, in his judgment, this remedy can be granted?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, after the 5th of next month, we will begin the consideration of the regular appropriation bills, but unless whatever money is supplied for these activities is made immediately available it would not be available until the 1st of next July.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will ask the gentleman this question: Will there be an estimate from the Secretary of Agriculture when you go to prepare the bill?

Mr. MADDEN. It is in the estimates for the next bill.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Oh, if the estimates are in the next bill it is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS.

Center Market, Washington, D. C., operation: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to defray all necessary expenses in carrying out the act approved March 4, 1921, entitled "An act to repeal and annul certain parts of the charter and lease granted and made to the Washington Market Co. by act of Congress entitled 'An act to incorporate the Washington Market Co.'," approved May 20, 1870; to pay for ice, electricity, gas, water, fuel, travel, stationery, printing, telegrams, telephones, labor, supplies, materials, equipment, miscellaneous expenses, necessary repairs, and minor alterations to be reimbursed by any person for whose account any such expenditure may be made; to employ necessary persons, including, for a period of six months after the property of the Washington Market Co. is taken over by the Secretary of Agriculture and without reference to civil-service requirements, such employees of said company as the said Secretary may deem necessary; to provide a fund for the payment of freight, express, drayage, and other charges and claims against commodities accepted for storage, and to require reimbursement thereof with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum; and to remove, sell, or otherwise dispose of such commodities held as security for such payments when such reimbursement is not made when due, all reimbursement of such payments and all receipts from such disposition of commodities to be credited to such fund and to be reexpended therefrom for the same purposes during the fiscal year 1922, $75,000.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to have the chairman of the committee explain to us just what the situation is in regard to the Center Market, and how much money we intend to invest there in repairs and so forth, and what will be the situation after we have spent that money.

Mr. MADDEN. One day when Congress was in a mood to reform things, I suppose, it passed a law that required the Government of the United States to take over from the private owners the Center Market and conduct it as a Government enterprise. Under that law there was a provision for the appointment of a board of arbitrators to fix the payment to be made to the private owners. The board of arbitrators had an appropriation of $35,000 for their expenses. They have not yet decided this question, but the law provides that on the day the decision is rendered this property becomes the property of the Government of the United States.

Mr. SNELL. To whom does the property belong now?

Mr. MADDEN. To the Washington Market Co., a private corporation. The Secretary of Agriculture requested $141,000 for this activity for seven months. After careful consideration we decided that we could not get control of the property until about the 1st of March. Hence we cut to $75,000, which would be equivalent to $141,000 for the period that he suggested. He asked $30,000 for repairs and alterations which we did not allow, and other things which we did not allow. We do not know what the result of this new scheme is going to be when we take it over, except, judging from past experience, we may reasonably conclude that it is going to be a burden on the people.

Mr. SNELL. Then you are not doing anything here except carrying out a law that has already been passed?

Mr. MADDEN. That is all, and we were reluctant to do that. They have an assembly hall there now which is rented for dances and jazz, and then there are bowling alleys and all that sort of thing. It was proposed by the Secretary of Agriculture to remodel that feature of the market and make assembly halls for the gathering together of the employees of the institution at a cost of $30,000. We refused to allow them to do that. We believe if we have to conduct this Washington Center Market we ought to conduct only the business feature of it and not the amusement features.

Mr. SNELL. Are we going into the business of selling vegetables?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no. We shall rent the space to the occupants of the stalls. We shall have to make repairs of that space. We shall run a cold-storage plant there, and we shall have to take the supplies that are shipped for cold storage from anywhere in the United States and pay the freight on them when they arrive. We shall have to do so many things that it would make me sick to think about them. Of course, the only thing to do with this proposition, in my judgment, if we are going to run it at all, is to turn it over to the District Commissioners, to be conducted by them, and not have the Secretary of Agriculture charged with this incubus.

Mr. SNELL. Or else give it away.

Mr. MADDEN. To give it away would be cheaper.

Mr. KELLER. How are we going to pay for the property?

Mr. MADDEN. That is already provided for. When the award is made that is provided for in the act that was passed previously.

Mr. CROWTHER. How much more money ought we to spend before we give it away?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to be asked to calculate too rapidly. My mind works slowly. [Laughter.]

Mr. CROWTHER. Is it not true that the private corporation that ran this made a successful profit out of it?

Mr. MADDEN. They will say so, because that will help to increase the price.

Mr. CROWTHER. How much of the $35,000 appropriated goes for the salaries of the arbitration commissioners?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not state that. The best figures that we have as the result of our investigation show that they made a profit over and above dividends of 5 per cent and other costs, of $16,000 on a business of about $280,000 a year.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations knows that the purpose of the legislation to which he refers was to make it possible for the Government to realize some fair return on the property which it owns where the market company is located. It had there tied up subject to action by Congress very valuable property, which was leased to the Washington Market Co. for 99 years at a rental of $7,000 a year.

Mr. MADDEN. And they paid $33,000 a year in taxes, and of course we will not get any of those taxes now.

Mr. MAPES. They paid altogether, I think, in taxes and rentals a fraction of 1 per cent per year upon the value of the property.

Mr. MADDEN. But they paid taxes.

Mr. MAPES. And it was for the purpose of allowing the Government to realize something out of this valuable property that the law was passed which repealed the lease, and of course the law provided that the Government should pay the owners the fair value of the buildings which they owned, which were on the Government land.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope that expectation will be realized.

Mr. MAPES. The land was owned by the Government and not by the Washington Market Co.

Mr. MADDEN. True.

Mr. MAPES. All the Secretary of Agriculture is supposed to do is to rent this property to the tenants who are now in the buildings.

Mr. MADDEN. But he is figuring on expending in overhead charges about $140,000 for seven months, and the gentleman can figure out how much it will be for the other five months and find out how much it amounts to.

In addition to that, my friend from Michigan will find that we shall lose $33,000 a year to the Treasury of the United States in taxes that these people paid on the property.

Mr. MAPES. But we ought to get several hundred thousand dollars a year for the rental of the space in these buildings.

Mr. MADDEN. We will get about $230,000.

Mr. MAPES. And the money we expend ought to be reimbursed to the Treasury many times over.

Mr. MADDEN. I will tell the gentleman what I think about it. From the investigation that I made and from the information I was able to obtain, I think you will find that the expenses will be about $250,000 a year and the revenues about $230,000 a year, and it may be worse than that.

Mr. MAPES. If that is true, the Government will not act as most of the landlords have in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SNELL. We know that is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent. There is nothing before the committee.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair,

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendments bill and joint resolutions of the following titles:

H. R. 8346. An act granting the consent of Congress to the board of supervisors of Whiteside County, Ill., to construct a bridge across Rock River;

H. J. Res. 210. Joint resolution for the appointment of one member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; and

H. J. Res. 225. Joint resolution authorizing payment of the salaries of officers and employees of Congress for November, 1921, on the 23d day of said month.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 33) permitting Chinese to register under certain provisions and conditions.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 6053. An act to amend section 955 of the Revised Statutes by extending the jurisdiction of courts in cases of revivor.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. It has been called to my attention by some one interested with reference to this item which has been passed over. I want to ask the chairman if the item to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to comply with the safety appliance act was allowed?

Mr. MADDEN. I just discussed that for about 10 minutes with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who asked the same question.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries, fees, and expenses of United States marshals and their deputies, including the office expenses of United States marshals in the District of Alaska, services rendered in behalf of the United States or otherwise, services in Alaska and Oklahoma in collecting evidence for the United States when so specially directed by the Attorney General, and maintenance, alteration, repair, and operation of horse-drawn and motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles used in connection with the transaction of the official business of the office of United States marshal for the District of Columbia, $140,000.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman why such a large amount as $140,000 is necessary to pay salaries for United States marshals in a deficiency bill?

Mr. MADDEN. That is on account of the great increase in business in the United States courts. The Attorney General has no control over that.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of assessing and collecting the internal-revenue taxes, as provided by the revenue act of 1918, including the employment of the necessary officers, attorneys, experts, agents, accountants, inspectors, deputy collectors, clerks, janitors, and messengers in the District of Columbia and the several collection districts, to be appointed as provided by law, telegraph and telephone service, rental of quarters outside the District of Columbia, postage, freight, express, and other necessary miscellaneous expenses, and the purchase of such supplies, equipment, furniture, mechanical devices, printing, stationery, law books and books of reference, and such other articles as may be necessary for use in the District of Columbia and the several collection districts, $1,792,000.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 6, after the figures $1,792,000 strike out the period and insert the following: Provided, That no more than $100 shall be expended for new furniture.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, it was said a few moments ago that when purchasing furniture for new bureaus it was necessary to buy the furniture already in Government storehouses. I stated to the chairman of the committee that there is $750,000 worth of old furniture in the storehouses in Washington. I want to test whether the statute is in force by this amendment providing that no part of this appropriation beyond $100 shall be expended for new furniture. The appropriation of $1,792,000 is not limited. I remember a year or two ago a gentleman from the other side stated that the architects were employed to draw plans for furniture for dormitories near the navy yard; that when the furniture was delivered they considered it was not good enough, so they sold it and went to the ordinary department stores and bought furniture. This is a time for economy, which we all favor. I want to test whether the statute cited by the gentleman from Illinois, now on the statute book, is of any value. It is not stated the kind of furniture need. Out of the $750,000 worth are tables, chairs, rugs, and carpets, and we ought to find enough furniture to supply the Internal Revenue Bureau. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to say in connection with the amendment offered that the General Supply Committee has whatever furniture the Government needs and the power to dispose of it, and every department must buy from the General Supply Committee.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. And some of the furniture that they have is new furniture, and under this amendment they would not be able to buy it even if the Government was in need of it.

Mr. WATSON. I understand there is $750,000 worth of old furniture?

Mr. MADDEN. It might be very embarrassing to the department if they could not buy more than $100 worth of new furniture. They may not need any furniture at all, but I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were 17 ayes and 35 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Military posts, United States: For the completion of the acquisition of lands at Camps Custer, Devens, Dix, Grant, Jackson, and Lee, $408,200, to remain available during the fiscal year 1923.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 14, after the figures "1923," insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For the maintenance and operation of the helium-product plant at Fort Worth, Tex., $100,000."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the amendment, under the law and rules applying to deficiency appropriation bills, is subject to a point of order, but I trust that the gentleman will not make it. The importance of the helium project, it seems to me, was lamentably demonstrated in the recent great catastrophe in England, the explosion of the ZR-2, in which many Britons and some Americans lost their lives. The helium plant at Fort Worth, Tex., by reason of insufficient appropriation when the Army bill was before the House during the last Congress, is to be closed on the 30th day of November. The best we can now possibly hope to do with the scant funds available is to leave the plant in a stand-by condition until the next regular supply bills will afford adequate sums for the next fiscal year.

The helium project has been conducted in this country by the War and Navy Departments upon a fifty-fifty basis. The appropriation made in the last Congress for the War Department lacked $150,000 of the amount contemplated in a lump sum appropriated in the naval bill for undertakings of this character, and consequently this amendment which I have offered still lacks $50,000 of being the amount which is authorized under the naval supply bill. The project, I repeat, has been carried on by the Army and Navy on a fifty-fifty basis. This amendment is to equalize the appropriations in the two departments, in order that this important plant may be continued without harmful interruption.

This is a project not alone of war, but one the fruits of which may prove most useful in times of peace. This country has a practical monopoly of the world's supply of helium. If we should allow this plant, the only one of its kind in the world, to stand idle, I think we should make a great mistake.

I call attention to the fact that under our present contract we get only 15 per cent of the gas from Petrolia, Tex., from which this helium is extracted. Eighty-five per cent of it is being used commercially, and our available supply, therefore, is rapidly going off into thin air. I think there is no nation in the world which could reasonably afford the expenditure that would not gladly to-day pay us for the helium we have already extracted much more than that extraction has cost us. I wish it were possible in these brief five minutes to impress upon the minds of those who are not familiar with helium, its uses, its possibilities, and just what the importance of this project is. This being the first year of the operation of this plant, and helium being an important agency in time of peace as well as of war, this country having practically a monopoly of the supply of the entire world, and 85 per cent of the gas from which it is taken being used commercially, shall we now say that the other 15 per cent from which we are to derive our supply shall be abandoned because of a failure of sufficient appropriation, especially in view of the larger sums which we have already spent in successful experimentation to prove the undertaking a very practical and feasible one? And I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the experimentation with reference to helium has fully justified our hopes. In August the production of helium was 291,000 cubic feet, in September 333,000 cubic feet—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the ground of the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. The item is not germane to the paragraph and it is not proper to be brought in on a deficiency appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question or two of the chairman of the committee in reference to the marine cable to Alaska, which is referred to in the hearings of the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. The committee concluded, after careful consideration, that this is not a deficiency, and that it ought to come in in the regular way, and that there was no emergency in connection with it. It was not properly before us from the standpoint of either a deficiency or an emergency, and, besides, the cost of operating the cable was largely in excess of what we thought it should be, and we thought perhaps if we gave them time to reflect they might change their attitude with respect to the expense.

Mr. MILLER. I have read the hearings very carefully, and it seems to me that the Alaska cable is one of the few enterprises of the United States which is somewhere near a paying basis.

Mr. MADDEN. It is $500,000 and odd a year below a paying basis.

Mr. MILLER. It has turned into the Treasury $190,000.

Mr. MADDEN. But it is $500,000 and odd worse off than nothing.

Mr. MILLER. It carries $200,000, I should think, of Government business, and still notwithstanding that it turns $189,000 into the Treasury. The cable is in bad condition.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that is true, but it ought to come in in the regular way. It is not a deficiency nor an emergency.

Mr. MILLER. Probably that is technically correct. Does the gentleman think any legislation is necessary on which to base an appropriation in the next bill?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the gentleman from Washington look into that.

Mr. MILLER. I am asking the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the gentleman look into it. I shall cooperate with him in looking into the matter. I am not sure. I am in sympathy with the need for this service, but I think we ought to let these people realize that they can not sell the service conducted by the Government for 30 per cent of what private enterprise charges and then pay twice as much for the performance of the duties as a private enterprise pays, and then come to Congress in order to get money out of the Treasury to enable them to carry on their extravagances.

Mr. MILLER. The extravagance, as I understand it, turned in $189,000 to the Federal Treasury.

Mr. MADDEN. They are charging only 40 per cent of the rates that other people charge.

Mr. MILLER. There is no competition on that cable.

Mr. MADDEN. If there is not any competition, then they ought to be able to get the current rates, but they charge 40 per cent less than the current rates.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman think the rates the department has established are insufficient?

Mr. MADDEN. Altogether.

Mr. MILLER. The department establishes the rate.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and they ought not to be allowed to establish rates that will give them a chance to put their hands up to their elbows into the Treasury of the United States to make up a deficiency.

Mr. MILLER. I do not think there is any when they turned in $189,000 of profit.

Mr. MADDEN. They do not make a profit. They turn that much money in, but do not tell you how much they pay out.

Mr. MILLER. This Congress appropriates $140,000 a year for the support of that cable and they turn in $189,000.

Mr. MADDEN. They operate a cable ship over their right straight along, and pay the crew, and do a lot of other things that we do not know anything about.

Mr. MILLER. The cable ship is operated by the War Department.

Mr. MADDEN. It is all paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture and repairs of same for public buildings, $1,635.25.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WATSON: Page 32, line 2, after the figures "$1,635.25," strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That no new furniture shall be purchased except from the Government storehouses."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this is for an audited claim for an obligation created prior to 1919. The money has already been spent, bills have been rendered, and a final audit has been made. All there is to it is to pay the bill now. I make the point of order against the item.

The CHAIRMAN. It appears this is for a debt incurred in the purchase of furniture prior to the adoption of the statute referred to. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

For enforcement of the child labor law, $2.34.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying a few words in relation to the Post Office matters. I was called from the room when the Post Office section was read, and I ask your indulgence to refer back to that section. Of course, my colleagues all know we are having considerable trouble about post offices and postmasters. But that is not what I want to discuss particularly. It is the fact that in a newspaper from my home and in several letters that I have received in the last week I find that the Post Office Department is on this rampage of economy to which we are, of course, all pledged, and do not live up to very closely, as evidenced by spending $55,000 on the kitchen of the restaurant on the floor below and various other wild expenditures listed in this deficiency bill. But it seems to me the employees in the Postal Service in this country come nearer giving a dollar's worth of service for a dollar that is paid in wages than any of the departments that I know of. In my home city of Schenectady they have laid off, taken out of the service, 7 carriers and 10 substitutes and cut down the service to the community, which was not any too good before, but was giving general satisfaction. I hope the Postmaster General will hold a little conference with the heads of the other departments and see if there is not somewhere else they can practice economy rather than adding their contribution to the unemployed of the country, which condition is sufficiently aggravated by the failure to enact a tariff bill at this session, and leave the carriers where they are and give the public the service they are entitled to. They are the best class of service men we have in this country, and I hope the personnel is not going to be thinned out on the plea of economy. [Applause.]

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BURTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9237) had directed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded upon any of the amendments? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 9237) was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the documents referred to.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to inquire of the gentleman whether or not his extension of remarks refers to the petition said to have been presented by certain congressional medal of honor men in regard to the release of Mr. Debs from the Federal prison?

Mr. LONDON. Yes; that is it.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, the amendments effect no substantial change. They are practically changes of language. It is sought to accomplish exactly the same purpose as the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE—REPORT OF THE NATIONAL COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President, which was read and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the ninth report of the National Commission of Fine Arts for the period from July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1921.

The report deals with the progress made during the past 20 years in realizing the comprehensive plan for the entire District of Columbia reported to the Senate, as a result of extensive studies of the plans of capital cities in Europe. This plan was prepared as a public service by men of the highest standing in the professions of architecture, sculpture, and landscape architecture. Professedly it was based upon the L'Enfant plan of 1792 for the Federal City in the District of Columbia, designed under the personal supervision of President Washington; and, indeed, was largely an extension of that plan to cover the entire District. The L'Enfant plan was the first and most comprehensive design for a National Capital ever adopted. The plan of 1901 reasserted the authority of the original plan, extended it to meet the needs of the Nation after a century of growth in power, wealth, and dignity, and marked the path for future development. During the past two decades the essential features of the plan have been established, so that the work of the future will be largely a filling in of outlines. It is a source of satisfaction that so much has been done to make the city of Washington conspicuous among national capitals in respect of dignity, orderliness, convenience, and beauty. All that has been done increases the importance of adhering to a plan that during nearly a century and a quarter has abundantly justified the foresight and the vision of the founders of the Republic.

The report of the Commission of Fine Arts deals also with the plans made under the direction of the Secretary of War for the cemeteries in Europe where rest the bodies of American men and women who gave their lives in the World War. By reason of their location on the field of battle the French cemeteries have a double claim to our reverent consideration—they mark both the places of burial of our heroic dead, and also the very field on which their sacrifice was made. These cemeteries are indeed fields of honor. They represent in the highest and most sacred way the participation of this Nation in the Great War. They should be treated in a manner befitting their representative character.

Further, the report discloses the work of the commission in its many details. During the 11 years since Congress created that body, its helpfulness has constantly increased. In many fields it has established and maintained standards of taste; and in furthering and safeguarding the plan of Washington it is especially useful.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 22, 1921.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE—ANNUAL REPORT OF THE UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the following message from the President, which was read and ordered printed and, with accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Reform of the Civil Service:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by the act of Congress to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States, approved January 16, 1883, I transmit herewith the thirty-eighth annual report of the United States Civil Service Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 22, 1921.

STANDARD MEASURES FOR FRUITS AND VEGETABLES.

Mr. VESTAL rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. VESTAL. I rise to call up as unfinished business the bill H. R. 7102, and move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7102.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7102. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] will please take the Chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7102, with Mr. KELLEY of Michigan in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7102, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7102) to fix standards for hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] is recognized.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time remains of general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has 22 minutes. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINCO] has 50 minutes.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I was interrupted before when I attempted to present to the House several memorials submitted to the President of the United States.

I want to urge upon those who opposed my request that I be given an opportunity to present these memorials. It is the privilege of every member of a representative body to present minority and unpopular views. It is easy enough to permit one to express popular views. That does not require any exercise of democracy.

I accord to you the privilege of being wrong, and I ask the privilege of expressing those sentiments and giving expression to that philosophy which it is my right and my duty to present to the membership of the House.

I will read a memorial in the form of a letter presented to President Harding by four congressional medal men on the 13th of November, 1921. That letter reads:

LETTER TO PRESIDENT HARDING FROM CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL MEN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 13, 1921.

Hon. WARREN G. HARDING,
President, The White House, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We, the undersigned holders of the congressional medal of honor, wish at this time to second the memorial tendered you by the World War veterans, a copy of which is attached, believing that the sentiments they express represent the views of the rank and file of ex-service men the country over.

Had the comrade whom we honored this armistice day returned to America alive, he would perhaps be appealing with us to you for the release of these war prisoners.

You said at his bier on armistice day:

"His patriotism was none less if he craved more than triumph of country; rather it was greater if he hoped for a victory for all human kind. Indeed, I revere that citizen whose confidence in the righteousness of his country inspired belief that its triumph is the victory of humanity."

Mr. President, it is that very kind of citizen whom the Government is to-day holding behind prison bars for loyalty to their ideals. It was no easy task for them to risk unpopularity and prison to maintain these ideals against the majority of the people in time of war. Their loyalty to the interests of humanity as a whole, even against their country's decision to join the war, was what moved them to express the opinions which sent them to prison. We disagree with the methods of the men in prison. We followed ourselves the opposite course. But we respect them for their opinions and their courage, as we respect our own comrades.

We understand that every country in the world which engaged in the Great War has long since released from prison those who like these prisoners opposed the war. May we ask, Mr. President, why America, with her democratic ideals, should wait so long to do an act of justice and good will?

Again, on Armistice Day, you said:

"I can sense the prayers of our people, of all peoples, that this Armistice Day shall mark the beginning of a new and lasting era of peace on earth, good will among men."

May we ask as ex-soldiers, holders of the Congressional Medal of Honor, that you "mark the beginning of this new era" by expressing in an amnesty the generosity and good will of those of us who fought. As Americans we seek a return to that condition of good will and love of neighbor which obtained throughout our beloved country before the war.

Faithfully, yours,

CLAYTON K. STARK, Lampson, Wis.
JOHN J. KELLY, Chicago, Ill.
GEO. H. MALLON, Minneapolis, Minn.
BERGER LOMAN, Chicago, Ill.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONDON. No; I decline to yield.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I want to ask if that is an official utterance, that is all.

Mr. LONDON. Here is the memorial to which they refer:

MEMORIAL TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES FROM THE WORLD WAR VETERANS.

The World War Veterans, representing almost one-half million ex-service men who participated in the World War, many of whom bear the scars of battle wounds, appeal to you for the release of those prisoners now in Federal prisons who were convicted of opposing the war.

We understand that there are at the present time about 140 such prisoners in Atlanta, Leavenworth, and McNeill's Island prisons. We ask for their release as a matter of simple justice, since no possible purpose can be served by imprisoning them longer. Most of them were sentenced to terms ranging from 10 to 20 years, and unless they are pardoned by your order now the last of them will not be out for years to come.

It is not strange, Mr. President, that veterans of the World War should ask for the release of men who opposed war. These men were moved by the same ideals as moved us. They differed from us only as to the methods of achieving those ideals. We realized that it would be necessary first to fight to end war, while they, no doubt, believed that by not fighting war could be stopped forever. They did not see in the method of war the realization of their hopes for mankind. Who but the judgment of history shall say whether they or we were right in method? We accord to them the same right to follow the dictates of their faith and conscience as we take for ourselves.

We realize, Mr. President, that some of these prisoners belong to unpopular and sometimes misrepresented movements. Most of them are radicals; some militant, others merely passive. We make no distinction between them. We ask the release of all of them without discrimination, because they were all convicted of the same offense—that of opposing the war by spoken or written words or by labor activities construed as interfering with recruiting and enlisting. We can find no single instance of any of these prisoners having been convicted of committing an act of violence. Not one was a German spy.

In making this appeal we are conscious of speaking not only for the majority of the rank and file of ex-soldiers but for millions of plain people throughout the country. Practically every labor union in the United States has repeatedly urged the release of these prisoners, because they felt their imprisonment was a reflection upon American democracy and because they knew that every one of these prisoners opposed the war as an expression of his honest belief and his love of mankind. Not only labor unions but organizations of the people everywhere have passed such resolutions.

We trust that now, after the celebration of this great and solemn memorial to the war dead for which we have come to Washington, you will see fit to accord to these prisoners the speedy release which our ideals and the country's interest both demand.

A. G. COOPER,
National Chairman.
JOHN M. LEVITT,
Eastern Division Chairman.
CARL O. PERSSON,
Minnesota State Chairman.

Gentlemen, all countries of the world have released their war prisoners, and as I pointed out in my talk on amnesty on July 1, 1921, in France they went to the extent not only of releasing the political prisoners but in their general amnesty they included many persons who had committed offenses against the criminal code, offenses involving moral turpitude, in those cases where dependent members of families whose breadwinners were at the front were exposed to temptation by reason of the suffering occasioned by the absence of the supporter of the family.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Wingo] I was to control the time on this side. I yield five minutes now to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER]. [Applause.]

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I find it impossible to sit here without uttering a word of protest at what the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] has just attempted to foist on this House and the country, and that is the idea that there is any considerable number of ex-service men of the late World War living or dead who would for one moment give countenance or approval to the sentiments which he has sponsored by quoting and inserting into the Record the memorial which he has just read. [Applause.] That infinite concourse of the invisible; those immortal Americans who sleep beneath the sod in France, and who dying yet live, would turn over in their graves rather than give acquiescence or sanction, as the Member from New York would have you believe, to any such sentiments as he has quoted and approved here to-day. [Applause.] Let us honor and glorify this cult of the dead rather than impute to those who compose it sentiments of disloyalty and un-Americanism which cause even the living to glow with the crimson blush of shame. [Applause.] The World War veterans, the military organization from which the gentleman from New York assumes to quote with such authority, is an association which has been referred to before on the floor of this House. It is none other than the organization which my colleague and comrade [Hon. ROYAL C. JOHNSON of South Dakota] investigated less than four or five months ago. You will all recall the result of that investigation. He found, so he informed us, that that body was an organization of ex-service men permeated by socialistic ideas and un-American sentiments, out of harmony with the spirit with which the most of us, at least, fought, and I regret that it numbers among its membership any congressional medal of honor men—if the statement of these four gentlemen is true. Be that as it may, only a few short weeks ago in Kansas City the American Legion, composed of over a million ex-service men, who, I may say, are a fair average of the four and a half million men who offered their lives during the recent World War, passed the following resolution covering the Debs matter, and the House is entitled to know their sentiments, and I, therefore, quote the resolution:

(1) Whereas during the period of the war there were convicted and confined in various penal institutions a number of men charged and convicted of treasonable acts, utterances, and conduct against the Government of the United States; and

Whereas in numerous incidents influences have been brought to bear to secure the pardon of the criminals or to secure a general amnesty for all such so-called political convicts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled, That we oppose the pardon of Eugene V. Debs and any person convicted of any treasonable conduct against the United States Government, or the granting of a general amnesty to such convicts; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be spread upon the records of this convention and a copy thereof be sent to the President of the United States.

[Applause.]

That is the sentiment of a great national organization of men who fought the battles of this Nation in the recent World War, and I for one certainly hope that no Member of this body will leave this House with the impression, or that any citizen of this country will be misled into believing, that the men signing the resolution referred to by Mr. LONDON, honorable and brave soldiers though they be, spoke in any sense the sentiments of the vast majority of the veterans of the Nation. I think, gentlemen, that it is a gross injustice to the men who gave their lives and many of whom took the places of these draft evaders who were stimulated to an unpatriotic attitude toward the war and then assisted, aided, and abetted in their evasion of their military duty by the Socialist Debs, even to permit such a resolution to go into the Record of this Congress, and certainly, since the rules permit it, would I be lacking in my duty did I not voice my profound disapproval of the sentiments contained therein. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the lady from Oklahoma [Miss ROBERTSON].

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] if he ever had any knowledge of the interview that is said to have taken place between the Attorney General of the United States and Mr. Debs in this city a few months ago?

Mr. LONDON. I understand an interview has been had, and Mr. Debs impressed the Attorney General as being a man of extraordinary ability, high idealism, and uprightness of soul.

Miss ROBERTSON. Does the gentleman understand that the prisoner, who was given leave to come all alone unattended from a distant place where his abode now is and then return in the same way, was trusted to a very unusual degree by the Attorney General of the United States?

Mr. LONDON. I understand that in trusting him the Attorney General gave expression to the faith which he had in Mr. Debs, and that the Attorney General believed he was dealing not with a criminal, but with a man devoted to principle.

Miss ROBERTSON. For what purpose was he brought here?

Mr. LONDON. So that the Attorney General might get his viewpoint.

Miss ROBERTSON. Was he given any suggestion by the Attorney General as to the proper course for him to pursue?

Mr. LONDON. I presume that might have been under discussion. I have no knowledge of it.

Miss ROBERTSON. I do not know what took place at that interview, but the suggestion has come to me that Mr. Debs was given an opportunity to express his faith in the Government of the United States and his willingness to be like all other loyal American citizens, and to promise to be true to his citizenship and loyal to this Government.

Mr. LONDON. May I reply? I thought that was a question.

Miss ROBERTSON. I am always interested in prisoners, and perhaps in a way that the gentleman does not know, because in two or three instances in my own family we have been prisoners for conscience' sake. My grandfather wore the striped garb and shaved head of a convict in a penitentiary in the very State where Mr. Debs is because he would not stop preaching to the Indians.

He was confined illegally, as the Supreme Court decided. He refused to take an oath contrary to his conscience, but agreed to leave the State when he accepted the pardon tendered him. He did not continue in a useless martyrdom which only stirred up sectional bitterness, but went with his Indian congregation into the distant wilderness of what is now Oklahoma. So when I sat in the very chair that this man Debs had occupied across the desk from the Attorney General and looked over to him—as I fancied Mr. Debs had looked. By the way, I had heard him speak to a labor meeting in my home town, and I looked with horror then at a man who would come there and say the things against the Government of the United States that he said. [Applause.] I did not see how anyone could claim and receive the benefits of American liberty and be so disloyal to the United States. So it was with interest as well as curiosity I talked with the Attorney General that day I was sitting where Debs had sat, and the Attorney General spoke with great sympathy of these unhappy disloyal people. By the way, they say that all other nations have released political prisoners. Did they have many to release; did not they shoot them as they went along?

[Laughter and applause.] Has not America shown more tolerance in her lenient treatment of un-Americanism than any other country? The Attorney General said he felt we should attempt to Americanize, not to antagonize, these misguided ones. I understand Emma Goldman would try to be a good American if allowed to return, but that for her is no day of grace. To Americanize, that is the keynote, and if any man in any prison in this country is not ready to be a loyal American he ought to stay in prison. [Applause.]

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KELLEY of Michigan, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7102) and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8347. An act to authorize the New York Central Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River within the corporate limits of the town of Gary, Ind.;

H. R. 7394. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Tombigbee River at or near Ironwood Bluff, in the county of Itawamba, Miss.;

H. R. 8346. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Board of Supervisors of Whiteside County, Ill., to construct a bridge across Rock River; and

H. J. Res. 225. Joint resolution authorizing payment of the salaries of officers and employees of Congress for November, 1921, on the 23d day of said month.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2724. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the White River, in Prairie County, Ark.;

S. 2722. An act to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the White River at or near the town of Des Arc, Ark.;

S. 1039. An act for the promotion of the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy, and for other purposes;

S. 2555. An act to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Great Peedee River, S. C.;

S. 2594. An act authorizing the counties of Allendale, S. C., and Screven, Ga., to construct a bridge across the Savannah River, between said counties, at or near Burtons Ferry; and ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 7294. An act supplemental to the national prohibition act.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the business under the Calendar Wednesday call to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to dispense with business under the Calendar Wednesday call to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a moment to propound an inquiry of the gentleman from Wyoming.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if it is expected that the bill providing for the appointment of additional Federal judges is likely to be taken up to-morrow under a rule?

Mr. MONDELL. Would the gentleman who has propounded the inquiry like to have it taken up to-morrow?

Mr. WALSH. I will state that I would be glad to stay here this evening and have it taken up now if the gentleman from Wyoming would assure the House that there is a quorum within call.

Mr. MONDELL. If I was really certain that there would be a quorum, I think it might be appropriate to take up the bill the gentleman refers to, but I am inclined to the opinion that there is not likely to be many in excess of a quorum to-morrow. In that condition of affairs I feel a little doubtful if we should take up so important legislation.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, November 23, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TAX REVISION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before this report is agreed to I want to say a few words in reviewing the history of this bill to amend our tax laws.

What the bill actually does, in the main, is to reduce very largely the tax on incomes which are over $200,000. It also repeals utterly the so-called excess-profits taxes, amounting this year to $450,000,000, the repeal to take effect next year. These are the taxes which have been levied heretofore on the very high profits of the most prosperous corporations in the United States. In substitution for those taxes, the bill levies an insignificant increase of 2½ per cent on all corporations, whether prosperous and highly profitable or not. That is to say, it increases the flat tax on corporations from the present 10 per cent to 12½ per cent.

Mr. President, giving that as the gist of this bill, let me follow the course of its history briefly after it reached the Senate.

The Finance Committee, which reported this bill, and which, no doubt, represented the management of the Republican majority in the Senate, attempted a number of very well-defined purposes. In the first place, the Finance Committee, headed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], attempted an enormous reduction in the surtaxes imposed on large incomes—the incomes which run into large figures. On the smaller incomes of the country it made the most nominal and insignificant reductions.

As reported by the committee, this so-called tax reduction bill proposed a reduction of $70 a year on incomes of $10,000 a year, and, of course, on incomes of less than $10,000 a year the reductions were still more insignificant.

On an income of $20,000 a year the committee proposed a reduction in the tax amounting to $250. That, also, is not a great reduction.

On an income of $100,000 a year, however, the committee proposed to reduce the tax $2,730. Now we begin to see the reduction cut some important figure for the relief of men enjoying large incomes.

On an income of $150,000 a year the committee proposed to reduce the tax $12,730. Here again we note a rapid progression in the relief afforded to men of large incomes.

Reaching an income of $200,000 a year the Finance Committee proposed to the Senate a reduction of $24,370. That is to say, a man enjoying an income of $200,000 a year was to be given relief to the extent of $24,370 in the tax that he had been heretofore paying.

When we reach a man with an income of $300,000 a year we find that the committee asked the Senate to reduce his taxes to the extent of $52,730 a year.

When we reach the man with an income of half a million dollars a year we find that the head of the Finance Committee and the Republican managers of the Senate proposed to reduce his taxes $114,730 a year.

When we reach the citizen who has an income of a million dollars a year we find that it was proposed to give him relief from taxation to the extent of $274,730.

I am not going further than the man with an income of $5,000,000 a year. There are a good many men who have larger incomes than $5,000,000, but in the case of every man having an income of $5,000,000 a year this committee, inostensibly carrying out the pledge of tax reduction for the country, proposed to reduce the taxes of that man with an income of $5,000,000 a year to the extent of $1,594,730 a year.

That is what the committee proposed, and that is what would have been accomplished in the Senate had it not been for the determined fight made by Democratic Senators upon this side of the aisle, assisted as it was by a number of Republicans upon the other side of the aisle who felt that it would be an outrage upon the country to perform a pledge of tax reduction by giving the relief almost entirely to men enjoying the greatest incomes in the country.

In contrast to that, let me show what was actually done here in the Senate as a result of this cooperation between the solid Democratic vote of the Senate and the small number of Republicans on the other side of the aisle who voted with us to bring about greater equality and reduce the proposed favoritism.

On the income of the man having $10,000 a year, the result of the Senate debate was to leave the reduction as it had been placed by the committee at $70.

On the income of the man having $20,000 a year, the result of the struggle in the Senate was to make his reduction $240, instead of, as had been proposed, $250.

On the income of the man having $100,000 a year, the result of the struggle here in the Senate was to defeat the proposal of the committee to give him a reduction of $2,730, and he was given a reduction of $1,240.

On the income of the man reaching $150,000 a year, the result of the struggle here in the Senate was to give him a reduction of $4,040, instead of, as proposed by the committee, $12,730.

On the income of a man amounting to $200,000 a year, the result of the struggle here in the Senate, was to give him a reduction in taxes of $14,040 instead of $24,370.

On the income of a man amounting to $500,000 a year, the result of the struggle here in the Senate, was to give him a reduction of $40,000 in taxes instead of a reduction of $114,730, as proposed by the Finance Committee.

On the income of a man amounting to $1,000,000 a year, the result of the debate and struggle here in the Senate, was to give him a reduction of $110,000 in his taxes instead of, as proposed by the committee, $274,730.

On the income of a man amounting to $5,000,000 a year, whereas the committee had proposed to give him an abatement of his taxes amounting to $1,594,730, the result of the struggle here in the Senate, was that his reduction was made $710,000 a year.

In other words, the result of that struggle here in the Senate was practically to cut in half the proposed reductions which had been given on the taxes of great incomes, and to save that much at least to the Government from those who could well afford to pay what they have been heretofore paying.

Mr. President, I mention this because that was a well-defined struggle here upon the floor of the Senate. It was a struggle against odds. The Finance Committee had reported to the Senate a reduction in the surtaxes on these enormous incomes. The Finance Committee had behind it an enormous pressure coming from the great interests of the country which had contributed largely to finance the Republican campaign and which no doubt had the pledge from Republican managers that their taxes would be reduced when the Republicans came into power.

It is perhaps not surprising that the Democratic Senators on this side of the aisle belonging to the minority party should have waged their war to avoid the carrying out of this bargain; but I want to compliment those Senators on the other side of the aisle belonging at least nominally to the Republican Party for joining the Democrats in bringing about that saving to the Government, for joining the Democrats in preventing that campaign pledge from being carried out to the uttermost.

That was one of the things attempted by the Finance Committee when it brought in the revenue bill to the Senate. It attempted to make an enormous reduction in the taxes of the very wealthy men of this country, having incomes running from $150,000 a year to millions of dollars a year. That attempt was frustrated in part by the fight that was made between the Democrats in coalition with a number of Republicans who would not tolerate the carrying out of such a compact.

But, Mr. President, that was not the only iniquity attempted in this bill by the Finance Committee when it reported the bill to the Senate. It attempted at that time to incorporate in the bill provisions exempting certain interests from taxation; and to my mind one of the most outrageous tricks in legislation is to exempt from the taxes, which all ought to bear, favored interests able to secure the ear of those in power. I shall not go into all of these exemptions, but a number of them were wiped out on the floor of the Senate by a determined fight, made largely, although not altogether, on this side of the Chamber.

I will refer to one particularly, namely, the attempt made by the committee in that bill in a number of places to exempt from taxation so-called "foreign traders." The term "foreign trader" was carefully defined. It was defined to be a man or a corporation doing 80 per cent of his or its business in a foreign country and deriving 50 per cent of his or its profit from business in foreign countries. Such individual was to be exempted from taxation upon all of the income he derived from that foreign business. While that is how the term "foreign trader" was defined, the very definition, when we come to examine it, includes bankers, so that the great international bankers of the United States, who, as we know, have been doing a large amount of foreign business recently in negotiating loans, in financing foreign cities and foreign Governments, would have come under the definition of "foreign traders," and all the great profits they have made in such transactions, which have come to this country in the shape of profits and dividends, would have been exempted from taxation by that exemption applying to "foreign traders."

After a very determined fight upon the floor of the Senate, that exemption was wiped out of the bill, and Senators have been told by the Senator from North Carolina that that exemption alone would mean a loss in revenue to the United States of $200,000,000. That means that $200,000,000 would have been deducted from taxes of the concerns which are now and which have been during the last year transacting a large amount of foreign business. This exemption was inserted in the bill under the pretense of a desire to encourage foreign trade and foreign commerce for the United States, but it also included foreign banking, which was not mentioned, but which was carefully provided for in the definition.

So I say that one of the results of the fight upon the floor of the Senate, with the solid array of the Democratic Senators on one side, aided by a strong faction of the Republicans upon the other side of the aisle, was to prevent the inclusion in the law of that exemption, that practical theft of $200,000,000 for favored interests.

There are other exemptions into which I shall not go, but there was one amendment which the Committee on Finance reported to the Senate and undertook to put through the Senate to which I wish to advert. It was the attempt to drop the so-called tax on the stock of corporations, which has been upon the statute books for a number of years. That tax is a nominal tax. It amounts to only one dollar on every thousand dollars of stock, and yet in the aggregate it amounts to $75,000,000. The bill, as reported by the committee, undertook to eliminate that tax, and of course its elimination would have afforded immense relief to the very large corporate interests of the United States. It is a tax not seriously felt by the ordinary corporation. On a small corporation of $100,000 capital the tax is only $100, or $250 on the corporation with a capital of $250,000; but when we come to the great corporations, with their millions of dollars capitalization, the elimination of that tax was a great Christmas present which the Committee on Finance proposed to give them. That was defeated, and that was one of the results of the determined fight upon the floor of the Senate made during the time the bill was under consideration.

These attempts to exempt from taxation the favored interests of the country, the great individual and corporate wealth of the country, had their counterpart in the attempt to unload on the masses of the people an increase in taxes. The Committee on Finance attempted to keep upon the statute books one-half of the tax on passenger transportation and one-half of the tax on freight transportation.

These taxes are borne by everybody. They increase the cost of travel and the cost of living. That attempt was defeated here on the floor of the Senate by Democrats and a few independent Republicans.

So much for what the committee attempted to do and what the active Democratic minority of the Senate prevented the committee from doing, with the aid of a minority of the Republican Senators.

I want now to examine for a moment what the Senate conferees have done with the bill which was re-formed here in the Senate and which was materially improved in the interest of justice and in the interest of the people by the fight which was made when the bill was before us. What have the conferees done?

Mr. President, when that bill was brought to the Senate it contained a provision, which originated in the House of Representatives, abolishing the excess-profits tax. That excess-profits tax was, to my mind, one of the most just and easily defensible taxes upon our statute books. It was a tax which fell only upon corporations earning extraordinarily large profits. It did not affect a corporation earning 5 per cent or one earning 6 per cent or 7 per cent or 8 per cent. It did not affect to any great extent the corporation which earned even 20 per cent, but it reached corporations earning more than 20 per cent, and it was a tax which will amount this year to $450,000,000, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury. The House of Representatives, under its Republican management, wiped out that tax, and it was proposed to substitute for it another tax on corporations. It was proposed to substitute an increase in the existing flat tax on corporations.

There is at the present time a tax of 10 per cent on all corporate profits, regardless of the rate of profit which a corporation makes. It was proposed to increase that tax from 10 to 15 per cent, and I think we can assume that there was behind that proposal the idea that there ought to be something substituted for the excess-profits tax on corporations, for Secretary Mellon before the Finance Committee used this language in advocating the repeal of the excess-profits tax:

In fairness to other taxpayers and in order to protect the revenues, however, the excess-profits tax must be repealed, not merely reduced, and should be replaced by some other tax upon corporate profits. A flat additional tax on corporate income would avoid determination of invested capital, would be simple of administration, and would be roughly adjusted to ability to pay.

The gist of the recommendation by Secretary Mellon is that while it was necessary for certain reasons, in his opinion, to repeal the excess-profits tax, amounting this year to $450,000,000 and in prosperous years to a great deal more, he thought there ought to be substituted for it some other tax on corporations. So there was put through the Senate a provision for an additional tax of 5 per cent, thus raising the flat tax on corporations from 10 to 15 per cent. That was not a complete substitute. It did not amount to $450,000,000, but it did amount to about $220,000,000.

What happened to that 15 per cent tax when it got into the hands of the conferees? They agreed to reduce that tax from 15 per cent to 12½ per cent, thus wiping out at once over $110,000,000 of the tax on corporations which was supposed to take the place of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. President, I think in that respect the bill has been immeasurably damaged. The conferees by that act have made a reduction in the taxes of prosperous corporations, and of all corporations, very much greater even than had been originally proposed when the bill was in the Senate.

There are a good many corporations making a 50 per cent profit, and under the bill as it now comes to us every corporation making a profit of 50 per cent a year upon its capital secures a reduction which runs all the way from one-sixth to two-thirds in the taxes it pays.

Think of making a reduction of $10 or $20 or $30 in the taxes of an individual who has a few thousand dollars a year income, all of which, practically, he uses for his living expenses, as is proposed in the lower schedules of this bill, and reducing the taxes of the great corporation which makes a profit of 50 per cent a year one-sixth or one-half or two-thirds; and the larger the corporation the greater the reduction.

There are many corporations in the United States making 50 per cent profit a year upon their capital whose taxes will be reduced more than one-half by this bill, even taking into account the increase in the flat tax on profits which has been made.

That reveals absolutely and clearly the policy underlying this bill. It is a policy designed to bring relief to the wealthy individuals with great incomes, and to the highly prosperous corporations with great profits, and they are practically the only ones who secure any relief by this bill worth mentioning. The other reductions are merely nominal; they are negligible.

Even a corporation which makes a profit of 33½ per cent a year on its capital will secure a reduction in its taxes varying from one-eighth to one-half, in proportion to the size of the corporation. The larger corporations get the one-half reduction, the smaller corporations get the reduction of one-eighth. So, running down the scale, when we come to the corporation making 25 per cent we find that it will secure a very material reduction and the corporation making 20 per cent will secure a considerable reduction, but when you get down to the corporations making only a moderate profit on their business the reduction is practically nothing at all, and in some cases their taxes will be increased by the slight increase in the flat tax.

So I say that we have revealed to us in the action of the Finance Committee as it brought the bill to the Senate and in the action of the conferees as they reported the bill back from conference the studied purpose that has been kept in mind of bringing relief to the wealthy individuals of the country with large incomes and bringing relief to the great corporations enjoying large profits while practically ignoring the rest of the taxpayers of the country and giving them little or no relief at all.

There is another thing that I forgot to mention when I was mentioning the results of the struggle upon the floor of the Senate. Another result of the debate and the struggle was to increase the taxes upon estates. As reported by the committee there was a maximum tax upon estates of 25 per cent.

Upon the floor of the Senate amendments were engrafted upon the bill so that when an estate exceeds $15,000,000 and does not exceed $25,000,000 the taxes were increased to 30 per cent on that excess, and when an estate exceeds $25,000,000 and does not exceed $50,000,000 that excess was taxed 35 per cent, and so on up until we reached the estate of $100,000,000, when the tax was made 50 per cent on everything over $100,000,000. Those amendments were fought into the bill under debate upon the floor of the Senate in spite of the opposition of the Finance Committee. The conferees wiped them out. They restored the original recommendation of the Committee on Finance, so that again is one of the things that happened to the bill as the result of passing through conference.

I have already referred to the fact that when the conferees brought the bill back here the proposed increase of 5 per cent on the flat corporate tax had been reduced to 2½ per cent increase, and that little 2½ per cent increase, which amounts to $110,000,000 a year, is the only thing left to take the place of the abolished excess-profits tax, amounting to $450,000,000 a year.

Mr. President, I could mention a number of things that happened in conference which violate evidently the purpose of the Senate in passing the bill and which destroyed the effect of the struggle here in the Senate to improve the bill. I shall close simply by mentioning the fact that after the Senate had, as a result of prolonged debate, engrafted upon the bill an amendment providing that tax records should be public records open to public inspection the conferees agreed to abandon that amendment. They agreed to restore the law as it has been heretofore, which locks up those tax records and makes them secret and private except under very difficult and narrow conditions.

It is only a matter of time when the American people are going to insist that tax records shall be public. Real estate tax records are public, personal tax records in all the States are public. Why should the tax records of the Government of the United States be made private and secret? Why have not the people a right to know what their neighbors pay? We know what the laborer earns, we know what the clerk earns, we know what real estate rents for, we know what our public officials receive, we know the average income of the ordinary man in everyday life. Why should these tax records, which deal largely with large incomes, be kept secret? It is said that it is on the ground of private interest; that it is on the ground of private rights. Mr. President, in my opinion there are no private rights which compare to the public interest in this matter. Secrecy is an invitation to fraud. Secrecy suggests corruption. There is nothing like publicity to make our taxes honest, and to make the administration of those taxes honest.

When the committee abandoned that amendment which was ingrafted upon the bill in the Senate they abandoned one of the most self-evident reforms that can be mentioned. They abandoned something which they will be compelled some day by public opinion to accept.

Mr. President, this is in line with the whole history of the bill. From the time that it reached the Committee on Finance the responsible management of the Republican Party has done everything possible so to mold the bill that while in name it gives relief from the tax burdens of the past, it gives it only to the favored interests and the favored few. That is the history of the bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has just referred to the elimination of the amendment regarding publicity for tax returns. I recall that in looking through the bill after it came back from the conferees I missed that provision, and I did not have an opportunity to follow it up and see whether my first impression was right or not. The thought I gathered was that not only did they eliminate the provision making these returns public, but they eliminated the provision of the present law which permitted either House of Congress to call for those returns, so that now under the bill as we have it presented to us only the President of the United States can permit those returns to be examined and neither House of Congress can do it, if I have gathered the correct idea.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that that was the so-called Reed amendment, which was not agreed to. That was not the existing law.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Will the Senator kindly point to that? I think I can call to his attention where the right of either House of Congress to demand these returns has been eliminated from the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. But that was not in the existing law. That is all I can say about it. That was an amendment which was offered to the bill by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and agreed to by the Senate, and it is true that it has been eliminated.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I am right to this extent, that while it is not in the existing law, yet in the bill as it went from the Senate to the conferees it was provided that either House of Congress could require those returns to be made available for the use of either House?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But now that is eliminated, so that neither House of Congress can make those returns available or get the information which might be derived from them.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct in the last statement, but of course the Senator's first statement was that it was the existing law, which is an error.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska if there is any way by which, under the rules of the Senate, the conference report could be referred back to the conference committee with instructions?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think, of course, the Senate can refuse to accept the conference report.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senate can vote down the conference report, or the Senate can recommit the conference report with instructions.

Mr. PITTMAN. I prefer to see it recommitted with instructions.

Mr. SMOOT. The question before the Senate is simply to adopt or reject the report.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. While that is the question before the Senate, I presume a motion to recommit with instructions would take precedence.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I do not doubt that.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no question about that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think such a motion should be made. I think the Senate should make some effort to enforce upon its own conferees the decisions that it reached. We have no evidence whatever that the Senate conferees made any effort to secure from the conferees of the House any recognition of those important amendments which have apparently merely been abandoned.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows of anything more injurious to representative government than to have a legislative body debate for days and weeks upon important amendments to proposed legislation, have the roll called and a vote recorded, and then to have a group of men go into a conference room, secretly confer, and eliminate the recorded decisions made by that legislative body as if it were of no consequence whatever. Is there anything left for a free people except a political revolution if that thing continues to an extent that it completely nullifies the power and voice of the majority?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think there may be the ballot by which they can retire from office those Senators who have taken that attitude and broken that trust. My idea is that this legislative body has a right to have represented in the conference the ideas which it has enacted by placing hard-fought amendments on a bill. We have no evidence here whatever that any effort was made by our conferees to retain those amendments. In fact, there is all circumstantial indication that they were very glad indeed to surrender the amendments. We know, as a matter of fact, that they would have surrendered the increase which the Senate made in the surtaxes if it had not been for the fact that the House itself took the situation in hand and forced its own conferees to accept the action of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And in the only instance when the House was permitted to render a decision on questions upon which this body had made its decisions—in that one instance they approved the course taken by the Senate. The House was denied any opportunity whatever to pass judgment upon the very many important amendments upon which this body had solemnly and after much deliberation adopted. I can not conceive of anything more destructive of representative government, anything eating more at the vitals of representative government, that is bound, if consented to without protest and political division, to lead to the destruction of our institutions, than abandoning and treating as naught in secret conference the judgment of the representatives of the people in their Congress. It is a political cancer that will spread until it prostrates our system of government unless we use the surgeon's knife before it is too late.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that there never was an item yielded by the conferees of the Senate until after a vote had been taken by the conferees of the House—

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am not talking about conferees.

Mr. SMOOT. And until a majority of the conferees had agreed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am not talking about the conferees. I am denouncing a system of legislation which allows one branch of a legislative body to deliberate for weeks and months, call the roll and have a vote, and then allows the other branch of the Government to appoint their representatives, and finally allows three or five men from the other branch and a like number from this branch to meet and throw into the waste-paper basket the votes and the roll calls of the representatives of the people in either House of the Congress. I say to the Senator that if that is carried on, if that kind of work is permitted to go on unchecked, it will be doing in America the business of encouraging bolshevists and anarchists. The people of America want the roll called here and decisions made on their petitions, and they are willing to abide by the decision when made openly and by the consent of the majority, but they want their own representatives to stand up and be counted, and they do not want the action of their representatives to be thwarted by men whose names and votes are not recorded and who meet privately and secretly and repudiate the action of their own representatives in their own Congress.

That is the protest I make. The fact that there has been no record made or a record permitted upon these most important amendments in the other branch at the other end of this building, I repeat, is an indirect invitation to advocate revolution that is bound to come some day if this method is carried on day after day and week after week and session after session. This system is not open, public representative government; it is a form of autocracy and has all the evils of the secret diplomatic system which has caused such a loss of human life and promoted misery, suffering, misunderstanding, and wars wherever practiced.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to charge any motives to the Members of the House of Representatives. I think it is unnecessary.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am not denouncing motives. I am denouncing this kind of governmental machinery; I am denouncing tyrannical rules; I am denouncing taxation without representation; I am denouncing autocracy masquerading as democracy.

Mr. SMOOT. The conferees of the House could have taken back to the House any question that was in conference. The conferees of the House did decide to take the question of the surtaxes back to the House for its decision. I do not know of another amendment that they could not have taken back in the same way.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Utah a question. When the House conferees said that under their instructions they would have to take this matter back to the House if it was proposed to reduce the surtax rate below 50 per cent, I wish to ask the Senator from Utah, when that statement was made by the House conferees, if the House conferees were not informed that they might state to the House that the Senate conferees would be glad to make a compromise?

Mr. SMOOT. I never heard any of the House conferees say that they were instructed to take that back to the House. I do not think they were instructed.

Mr. SIMMONS. They were instructed.

Mr. SMOOT. I followed the record pretty closely, and I do not think they were instructed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not mean "instructed"; I will take that back. It probably should have been put in another form, that they entered into an understanding which they felt was binding upon them, which they could not possibly disregard, that before any agreement was reached reducing the 50 per cent rate it should be taken back to the House in order that a vote might be permitted upon the proposition to reduce the rate.

What I ask the Senator is, if the House conferees when that statement was made did not have the assurance from the Senate conferees that they would gladly acquiesce in the reduction of that rate down to 40 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say, Mr. President, that this was the situation as it existed in the committee, although I do not know that I am authorized—

Mr. SIMMONS. When I say "the Senate conferees," I do not include myself, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Whether I am authorized to say it I doubt, but so long as the question has been brought before the Senate I am perfectly willing to state the situation, as I understood it. When the question was under consideration one member of the committee of conference who made the proposition asked, "Is there a chance for a compromise in the rate between 32 per cent and 50 per cent?" And he did suggest a compromise at 40 per cent. There was no action taken as to that either by the House conferees or by the Senate conferees. The House conferees stated that they felt that they ought to take the question back to the House for instruction. That is what the result of the conference was.

Mr. SIMMONS. Since the matter has been gone into thus far, I must state the exact facts. The chairman of the committee on the part of the Senate conferees—

Mr. SMOOT. Who spoke only for himself.

Mr. SIMMONS. Said this: "You may say to the House that the three Republican Senators who are members of the conference will accept a proposition of compromise fixing the rate at 40 per cent."

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say—

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator, but I should like to go on in a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to state, with the consent of the Senator, what really took place at that time. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], as I recall, never stated that he made the proposition in behalf of the three Republican conferees of the Senate or that it could be put through.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say, most emphatically that I heard the Senator from Pennsylvania distinctly and that he said, "You can say that the three Republican members"—that was his language—"will agree to that."

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I was one of the Republican members of that conference, and I never heard the Senator from Pennsylvania say one word to me about a compromise until he mentioned it in the conference.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I have stated occurred in the open session of the committee of conference.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the colloquy which has just taken place shows how damnable and contemptible is the present system of legislating in conference. The proceedings are carried on in secret; there is no roll call, no record of proceedings; any Senator may get up on this floor and deny that he voted in a particular manner or deny what he said, or deny what he did. I say, Mr. President, such a system of law-making is ruinous and destructive of free institutions. Proceed along that line, especially in connection with a bill which relates so closely and intimately to the welfare of the people as a tax measure, which touches the very foundation stones of government, and the result will be disastrous. If the system of taxation is not equal and just and fair to all classes, a foundation is laid which in the end will undermine the whole structure, no matter how strong we build above the foundation. That is why legislation, every step in the making of the law, should be done in the open and by the majority.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is simply condemning a method of procedure.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What have we just witnessed here? Senators are unable to explain or agree—

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Upon what took place in a secret conference dealing with a bill of this importance and of this character. I am not complaining about any one item; I do not care if every amendment was eliminated from the bill. What I do protest against is the lack of opportunity for the representatives of the people to vote; what I do protest against is the want of a record in the conference to show who did this work and how the votes were cast which eliminated these amendments; what I further protest against is making null and void the deliberative proceedings of a great legislative body by a very small minority behind closed doors.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say just one word.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to proceed, but I yield further to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that ever since there was a House and ever since there was a Senate compromises between the House and the Senate have been arrived at.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the conferees in their actions have been getting bolder and bolder.

Mr. SMOOT. The House of Representatives provided certain rates of surtaxes in this bill, the highest rate provided by that body being 32 per cent. The bill passed the Senate with a higher rate of 50 per cent. There was a difference between the House and the Senate. That was the question of compromise, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And it was left to the House and the House agreed with the Senate. That is the system that I am condemning; that is the system I am denouncing. Why were not such questions left to the House?

Mr. SMOOT. It was left to the House.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That one amendment, and that only, was left to the House. Am I right? Were the other amendments left to the House?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Were the other amendments left to the House that the Senate changed—yes or no?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think I am entitled to an answer. Were the other amendments left to the House for decision—yes or no?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Massachusetts will just be patient, I will answer him.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is not that a fair question?

Mr. SMOOT. I have answered the Senator once, but I will answer him again.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has not answered my question. He has answered to the effect that one amendment was left to the House; but what I ask is as to the other amendments that were adopted here after weeks of debate and struggle and many roll calls—were any amendments other than this one submitted to the House?

Mr. SMOOT. I have answered the Senator's question, but I will answer it again. The conferees of the House had a perfect right to take any other question to the House, but they did not decide to do so.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That does not answer my question. Be a man about it—say yes or no. The Senator knows that there was not a single, solitary amendment left to the House—

Mr. SMOOT. There was one amendment left to the House.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Except the one regarding surtax rates, to which the House agreed.

Mr. SMOOT. There was no other, and I have said so.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Why was there not any other? Was it not because the conferees did not want it done?

Mr. SMOOT. I will answer in my own way and not as the Senator from Massachusetts wants it answered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The way the Senator answers it is very evasive.

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the least. I have said more than once that there was only one amendment taken back to the House. The Senator from Utah has nothing to conceal.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will leave it to the Senator's colleagues to say how frank he has been; how willing he was to be frank.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that, while I agree with him entirely that there are gross abuses frequently in the practice of conference committees as to the abuse which he is now speaking of, it seems to me not to be attributable so much to the system of conference committees or to conferees as to the system of this very representative body which he is eulogizing or to the rule adopted by the representatives of the people in what is frequently called the more popular branch of Congress. The submission of one single item out of this great revenue measure, without an opportunity to vote upon other features of the bill, was due to the action taken by the representative branch of Congress, and not by the conferees at all.

I was very much surprised to hear the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts say that the action of a conference in arriving at a compromise between a 50 per cent income tax in the higher brackets—

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President—

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will ask the Senator to wait for a moment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I referred to no particular item; but I criticized the system.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just one second I will be glad to hear from the Senator from Massachusetts. He intimates that the method of arriving at a compromise between 32 per cent and 50 per cent as advocated, respectively, between the two houses of Congress would lead to a revolution. Mr. President, that has been the practice of parliamentary bodies ever since the development of parliamentary procedure. For a thousand years it has been in the process of development and of practice; and so far it has not been the cause of revolution, but it has been found to be an absolutely essential and necessary means of arriving at an agreement between the branches of any bicameral legislative body.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is absolutely right. The Constitution of the United States places upon the Senate and House of Representatives the responsibility for legislation. It is provided that that legislation shall be in the open; it is provided that a roll shall be called on the demand of one-fifth of those present at any meeting. That is in the interest of having the people know what is pending and how legislators vote, and having a record of the proceedings. However, there has grown up, Mr. President, a very bad system of so-called conference committees. It is quite possible to have a conference committee appointed representing the actual sentiment of the Senate and a conference committee representing the actual sentiment of the House, and having those conferees come together.

I think when they come together they should come together in open meeting, and I think the votes should be recorded; but that is not done. On the contrary, in this instance, the conferees of the House of Representatives did not represent the sentiment of the House and the conferees of the Senate did not represent the sentiment of the Senate; they represented the dominant Republican control in each House. The conferees on the part of the Senate were repudiated here upon the floor of the Senate by amendments which were driven into the bill in spite of their opposition. The conferees on the part of the House were ready and anxious to compromise upon the surtax rates, and it was only the authority of the House of Representatives itself which prevented those conferees from insisting upon a reduction of the maximum surtax rate carried by the Senate amendment. If the House conferees had insisted, the Senate conferees would have yielded, as we know, because it was common talk here in the Senate that, while we might force into the bill an amendment providing for a maximum surtax of 50 per cent, there would be a settlement probably at about 40 per cent. Who would make it? It would be made by the so-called representatives of the Senate who objected to the 50 per cent maximum rate. They would surrender that; we know they were going to surrender it, in whole or in part, as soon as they got there, just as they surrendered the publicity amendment and just as they surrendered one-half of the increased flat tax on corporations which the Senate fought for and secured.

No; this is not an open conference; this is not a free conference; this is not, in my opinion, a constitutional way to pass legislation. There has been created here by custom a third house, which has no constitutional warrant, which meets in secret, which has no record, and which very often violates first the sentiment of one House and then the sentiment of the other.

Mr. POINDEXTER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is not the condition which the Senator is now denouncing due very largely, if I may be allowed to refer to it, to the new rule of the House of Representatives governing conferences by which we are, as I believe, deprived of a free conference? I think that the Senator from Nebraska is absolutely right in his statement that this is not a free conference. I myself have had some experience with conferences of that kind. When we thought we had arrived at an agreement, we found that the conferees of the other branch of the legislature, instead of submitting the conference report which had been agreed upon, submitted items for a separate vote of the House and opposed in the other branch of Congress the agreement which had been reached in conference. Certain specific questions were taken out of the conference report and acted upon finally and conclusively in the other branch of Congress, the result being that we were denied the opportunity of a conference upon those features of the legislation which had been submitted to the conference, and consequently it was not a free conference. In that respect I agree absolutely with the Senator from Nebraska, although I may not agree in the particular application he is making.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator will agree to this: He served in the House, as I did; and he will agree that under the form of bringing in a great bill like this and jamming it through under a rule, as is often done and as was done in this case, it is legislating by machinery; and if under those circumstances the conferees represent only the dominant factor of the dominant party, their agreement does not represent the sentiment of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. The House voted for the 32 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; that is my idea exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. And that was the expression of the House at that time. I will say to the Senator frankly that in the conference it was agreed that at that time that was the sentiment of the House, but some of the Senators voted against it; and therefore the Members of the House wanted to follow the course taken by the Senators and changed their minds.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator that there was no adequate debate in the House on the question of making 32 per cent the maximum surtax. It was put through by machinery; but when the House Members had had the benefit of the great debate here in the Senate they were not only willing but they were determined to prevent their own conferees from reverting to the so-called decision of the House. That is just the benefit of having two legislative bodies. The second legislative body—particularly the Senate, where debate is free—very often changes the decisions previously reached in the other body, but a different situation arises if we have conferees who do not represent the majority opinion in the Senate, conferees who surrender without a struggle and without an explanation.

We have not had any explanation here of why the publicity clause was abandoned. We have not had any explanation here of why the tax on corporations is reduced from 15 per cent to 12½ per cent. We have not had any explanation of any other surrender that the conferees have made. They have simply handed in here a statement, nominally by the chairman of the committee, but actually drawn by one of the experts, explaining some of the mathematical changes which have resulted from the conference. That is all we have had. There has been no explanation even of this utter abandonment of these decisions of the Senate.

I am very much disposed to think that there ought to be a motion to recommit this conference report with instructions, and I hope some member of the committee will make it. If not, I shall take the liberty of making it myself later on.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before the Senator begins his statement, will he permit me to clear up a little matter of controversy?

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will wait until I get through. I shall not occupy the floor long, and what I desire to do is to clear up a little matter myself.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well. The only reason why I interrupted the Senator at this time was because of the fact that a member of the conference on the part of the House is present, and I wanted to make a statement in his presence.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have not taken any time in this debate and did not expect to do so. I shall occupy the attention of the Senate for a short time only; but I can not let go unchallenged some statements that have been made here this morning.

My colleague, the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], has referred to the way in which some improvements in the surtaxes of income taxes were brought about on this bill when the bill was in the Senate. He continually referred to the fact that what improvements were made were made by a solid Democratic vote and a minority of the Republican votes. I agree to that. I believe that the bill as it came to us was improved by that kind of a combination and I want to give credit where credit is due. I have no desire now and never have had and hope I never may have to take a partisan advantage. Perhaps I do not have as much partisanship as I ought to; at least I do not have the same amount that most of the Members of the Senate have; but when I hear my colleague expostulating here as to what was done by the solid Democratic vote and a few Republican votes my mind carries me back to 1917, when the Democrats were in control of this body, when Woodrow Wilson was in the White House, and when he moved a great many Senators as easily and as completely as the player moves the wooden pawns on the checkerboard.

I remember that in 1917, Mr. President, soon after we went into the war, the Senate fought for weeks over the proposition of increasing income taxes and increasing taxes on war profits, and I remember that there was then a Democratic majority and a Republican minority, and those fights were made by a few Republicans and a few Democrats who were always defeated. We were always in the minority. The difference between my colleague and these Republicans over here who have been fighting to improve this bill is that these few Republicans fight for those principles whether their party is in control or whether they are in a minority. My colleague fights for those things when he is in a minority and can not accomplish anything, and votes the other way when his party is in control.

Mr. President, in 1917, when we had the revenue bill here at the beginning of the war, if the few Republicans that my colleague is glad to work with now had had their way then, they would have increased the taxation on war profits in a way that would have brought into the Treasury of the United States more than a billion dollars in excess of what was brought into the Treasury. We were defeated, and my colleague, as did most of the Democratic Senators, helped to defeat that very thing. There were a few over there who voted with us on every one of those amendments, but the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was not one of them.

But, Mr. President, the thing I wanted particularly to call attention to was that these Republicans who voted then for an increased surtax on big incomes, these few Republicans, in the minority as they were, who fought for increased taxes on war profits when the Democrats were in power, were found when this bill came here with a Republican in the White House and with the Republicans in control of the Senate and of the House fighting for the same principles that they fought for then. Let us see.

On the 23d day of August, 1917, the Senate had the revenue bill before it for consideration. The Senate was Democratic and the House was Democratic. There was a Democratic President in the White House. The condition was just reversed from what it is now and the same question that had been up in this bill was up then, at a time when it was more important than now, because there was more profiteering then than now.

On August 23 the Senate voted upon an amendment which was offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the tax section of the bill that would have raised a revenue, according to the estimates of the experts at the time, if it had been put into the law, of $231,000,000. The rates of this amendment increased by gradual steps from sixty-six one-hundredths of 1 per cent on an income of $3,000 to 59.91 per cent on an income of $2,000,000. I find on looking at the Record that my colleague [Mr. HITCHCOCK], who is now boasting of the fight that he is making for increased taxes on big incomes, is recorded as voting "nay" on that amendment.

On the 7th day of September, 1917, the Senate voted on an amendment offered by the same Senator from Wisconsin to increase the taxes on individual incomes. The surtax rates of this amendment upon incomes of $5,000 and not in excess of $10,000 were lower than the committee amendment and higher on the larger incomes. The surtaxes began with a tax of one-half of 1 per cent on incomes in excess of $5,000 and not in excess of $6,000 and increased by easy stages until upon incomes in excess of $1,000,000 the surtax would have been 50 per cent.

That was quite an amendment, Mr. President. It would have brought in a very large amount of income; but some of these Senators, including my colleague, now so anxious to increase revenue and to increase the taxes on big incomes, I find upon examining the roll call voted against that amendment. Among the Senators voting "nay" is Mr. HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska.

On the 7th day of September, 1917, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], a Democratic Senator—one of the few Democrats, by the way, who voted with these few Republicans at that time, and who refused to follow the behest of the leader in the White House—offered an amendment to that bill. He increased the rates, according to his statement, as estimated at the time, so that it would have brought in an additional income of $144,000,000. I find when I look at the roll call that among those who voted "nay" is the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Then, Mr. President, on the 1st day of September, 1917, the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] offered an amendment to that bill that levied a tax of 73 per cent upon war profits. There was a great fight and a great debate over that amendment, but when the roll was called I find the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] voting "nay."

On the 5th day of September, 1917, the Senate voted on an amendment to increase the war-profits tax by increasing the rates of taxation on each of the brackets of the bill except the lowest. The rates in this amendment began with 12 per cent on profits not more than 15 per cent in excess of the prewar profits and gradually increased to 75 per cent when the war profits were more than 300 per cent in excess of the prewar profits—another amendment that would have taxed the profiteers; but I find upon looking at the roll call that my colleague [Mr. HITCHCOCK] voted against the amendment of the Senator from California.

I have had only a few minutes to look up this record, although I was very clear in my mind as to what it was. With additional time I should go further into it and show additional circumstances. But I only wanted to call the attention of the Senate—and I hope of the country—to the inconsistency of my colleague. He has been right this time, and in this instance I agree with him. I wish we could have kept the income tax at the present rate, and I voted against the bill because of the change in the rate, among other reasons. I intend to vote against the conference report, because I do not believe it is fair. It lets too much wealth escape taxation. But I think now, as I thought then, that the only difference between myself and my colleague is that at that time, with the Democrats in control, he was following the lead of the President in the White House, doing his dictation, or he is going contrary now to his convictions, or he has experienced a change of heart. I hope it is a change of heart, and the one thing to indicate that it is, is that there is a senatorial election coming on in Nebraska now, and there was not then.

Senators ought to vote their convictions, regardless of what party is in power, and we have a just right to be suspicious of the sincerity of any man who experiences a change of heart on the eve of an election, especially when he is to be a candidate at such election.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the suggestion has been made that a motion ought to be made to recommit the conference report. I am in sympathy with that suggestion. A few moments ago I expressed the opinion that a motion to that effect would be in order. After reflection, I am not so sure about that. I think if the Senate had the papers, and therefore under the rule would be required to first act upon the conference report, the motion could be made; but in this case the House has the papers, and the House has acted.

My understanding is that under the House rules a motion to recommit a conference report after the Senate has acted would not be in order. I fear very much that the same rule would obtain in this body in a case where the House acts first.

I therefore make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair, as to whether a motion to recommit would be in order under the present conditions?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that a motion to recommit is not now in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there has been some discussion with reference to the practice of conferees in disregarding the action of the House which they represent, and following their own wishes and views with reference to the matter in controversy in conference. In the main, I agree with the position taken by the Senator from Massachusetts; but I am not able entirely to agree with him. Of course, where there are two legislative bodies, and where it is necessary that their minds should be brought together in order to make their action effective, there must be some means, outside of the action of the bodies themselves, to bring together the conflicting views of the two bodies. As the Senator from Washington has said, I think that practically every legislative body in the world provides for a conference committee for the purpose of accomplishing that result. In the nature of things, it must be so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Nebraska stated, if I apprehended his remarks, that the proceedings of the conference committee were conducted in an unconstitutional manner; that it was an unconstitutional proceeding; that a third house had been created, which has arrogated or assumed the powers of the other Houses. Does the Senator agree with that theory?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It would seem to me that what the Senator has just said is the correct view of it, that a conference committee is a mere legislative device of the two Houses to suggest to the two Houses compromises and ways by which the two Houses themselves can take action.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I have said, and I was going to say more.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What I said was that a conference committee, representing the two Houses, ought to represent each its own House honestly, and I stated that the conferees on the part of the Senate, because they were opposed to amendments which had been put in upon the floor of the Senate, gave them away without regard to those they represented. I said, further, that the conferees on the part of the House were only prevented from yielding in a direction the Senate conferees desired they should yield by the declaration of the House of Representatives that they should not do so. I realize that there has to be a conference committee, although it takes to itself these outrageous powers; but I say that when the conference committee meets, in common honesty, and in order to carry out the purposes of the Constitution, the conferees who represent the Senate ought to represent the sentiment of the Senate, and the conferees who represent the House should represent the sentiment of the House. That result we do not get, and have not gotten in this case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska speaks of carrying out the views of the Constitution. The Constitution had no views about a conference committee, and no such committee is mentioned in the Constitution. It is a mere legislative device of convenience between the two branches. The Senator is correct in saying that he has said the things he has just said he said. He also said the things that I said he said. The trouble is that the Senator's grievance appears simply to be, not as to the institution of a conference committee, but that the particular members of this conference committee did not perform their duty in the way he thinks they should have done so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is something more than that, Mr. President. The only justification for selecting conferees is to get those who represent the sentiment of the Senate to meet with similar conferees on the part of the House. When our conferees directly repudiate the sentiment of the Senate, and use their power as conferees to defeat amendments for which the Senate has declared, they are false to their trust, and they defeat the honest purpose of the conference.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if that is so, the managers of the conference committee on the part of the Senate being the servants of the Senate, the remedy is in the hands of the Senate. If the conferees on the part of the Senate have betrayed the Senate, the Senate can discharge them or refuse to accept their recommendations. The remedy is a simple one.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would like to finish my statement, but I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to make merely a short statement. Under the rule which was adopted by the Senate, nothing new can be added by the conferees, and nothing can be taken away or eliminated from any provision which passed both Houses.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator will recognize the fact that it was necessary to adopt that rule in order to curb the power which conferees have been arrogating to themselves. Before that rule was adopted and insisted on they not only undertook to compromise the views of the Houses, but they introduced new legislation which had not passed either House. That merely bears out my thought, that the time has come when the Senate should insist that its conferees shall represent its views and not their own.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there were 833 Senate amendments, that the Senate conferees yielded on 7, and that the conferees on the part of the House yielded to 826. Of course, I concede that some of the seven amendments were important amendments, but so were some of the others very important amendments.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator from North Carolina will permit me one more interruption, I will say to the Senator from Utah that the amendments which the Senate conferees insisted on, and which they retained, are amendments which the Finance Committee ingrafted upon the bill, and the amendments which they surrendered were the amendments which were fought into the bill on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is in error in that statement. I shall not take the time of the Senator from North Carolina to answer it, but I simply say that the Senator from Nebraska is in error about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss the question which has been raised between the two Senators. I was discussing the matter of the conference.

As I said, the practice of appointing a conference committee, as we have evolved that system, is in conformity with the practices of practically all parliamentary bodies composed of two houses and requiring that there should be unanimity of action on the part of those two houses in order that their action should become effective.

Our system is not materially different from the systems of other countries, except possibly in the fact that we have not as thoroughly safeguarded the jurisdiction of the conferees of the respective houses as has been done in some other countries. I do not think that there is cause of complaint of a system providing a conference committee composed of representative Members of the two bodies, to come together and try to bring the action of the two Houses into accord and harmony. That is necessary, and the device of a conference is about the only one that mankind has up to this time worked out; but I believe that, by reason of the fact that we have not sufficiently limited the discretion of conferees, great abuses have sprung up in the actual or practical administration of this system in our country.

We have heretofore recognized that fact, and we have from time to time limited and defined the rights of conferees, with very good results. At one time the conferees on the part of the two Houses were so unrestrained in the exercise of their powers that they assumed to write into a bill matters of important legislative import which had not been considered by either House and upon which therefore there could be no disagreement. To meet that abuse we provided years ago that thereafter the conferees should have no power to add anything which had not been added by either House, or to subtract in certain cases. That limitation has been of great value. It has corrected many of the original abuses of the system. But in the Senate, as elsewhere, we correct abuses only when they have become so flagrant that they can not be tolerated any longer. I am of the opinion expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that the abuses which now prevail, and which are not denied, resulting in many instances in a miscarriage of legislation, have grown so flagrant that the time has come when we should further curb the powers and the jurisdiction of conferees.

I admit the difficulty in reaching the abuse that now exists. It is very well illustrated in what has happened in connection with the revenue bill. We have before us now an instance where the conferees on the part of the Senate undoubtedly would have given up a vital amendment which had been placed upon the bill by the Senate if the House had not, as the result of its provision, seen fit in effect so to limit the discretion of their conferees as to require that that question should be brought back to the House before any surrender should be made as to a rate not which the House had imposed but which the Senate had imposed and in which the House by its subsequent action showed it concurred, and which its conferees and the conferees of the Senate were ready to surrender.

We have this illustration before us. Here was an amendment adopted by the Senate, subsequently concurred in by the House in overruling itself, which the conferees on the part of the Senate, the body that had adopted the amendment, were ready to yield, and as to which the conferees on the part of the House would have yielded if they had not been pledged to take the question back to the House for its action. If that had happened we would have had this result: We would have had a provision limiting surtaxes to 40 per cent, when both branches of the Congress had deliberately declared they were unwilling that tax should be reduced below 50 per cent. In that case, of course, the will of the two bodies would have been defeated and brought to nought by the action of the conferees.

How are we to remedy this sort of thing? I think the remedy is probably twofold. Leading Members in the House never would have demanded and exacted the terms which they did and which forced the House conferees to carry this matter back to the House if they had not suspected that the conferees on the part of the House were not in sympathy with the action of the Senate with reference to that matter. They, therefore, indirectly it is true, placed a limitation upon the powers of the House conferees. Now, either House of the Congress could, where it has reason to question the concurrence on the part of the conferees which it appoints with respect to an important action of that body, instruct them as was done in this case, not by the House itself, but by leaders of the House, or instruct them by a vote of the body that before surrendering a vital question it should be brought back for the purpose of getting the instructions of the body with respect to it.

That practice would in a measure, I think, overcome the difficulty; at least I believe that where it is well known, as it was in this case, that the Senate conferees were not in sympathy with the action of the Senate with respect to most of the vital amendments which were made by this body, it would have been justifiable if we had segregated the amendments of great importance which we had reason to believe would be sacrificed if the conferees were permitted to exercise their will and discretion, and had instructed them with respect to those amendments.

That is one way of reaching the difficulty, rather cumbersome it is true, but not involving, I think, very much difficulty. Another means of doing it would be the selection, after the body has acted upon an important matter like this, of conferees known to be in sympathy with the action of the body. Under our system that can not very well be done unless we go outside of the membership of a committee. It could not have been done very well here because I know the Finance Committee as now constituted has upon it, representing the majority, a membership that is not very largely in sympathy with the views of the twenty-odd Republicans on the other side of the Chamber who as a bloc demanded of the majority members of that committee certain concessions and obtained them. The members of the committee were not in sympathy with that idea, and therefore, the effect and result was that we referred the matter to a conference committee the majority of whom were known not to be in sympathy with the action of the Senate upon these main propositions, although some of them had voted for them as a result of the agreement.

I say that so long as we are confined in the selection of our conferees to the committee bringing in the measure it would be difficult in circumstances like that to secure conferees whose views were in harmony with the action of the body, or in a case similar to the one about which we are talking. But I think that some reform can be worked out which would tend to remove the abuses that have undoubtedly crept into our system of bringing the minds of the two Houses together through a conference committee. I hope some of us will cooperate in trying to bring about some just and reasonable and fair rule that will further abridge the powers and the discretion of the conferees.

OPEN EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to present a request for unanimous consent. A number of nominations have come from the President; I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session for the purpose only of referring these nominations.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business in open executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting lists of Executive nominations, which will be read and referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations referred to appear at the end of Senate proceedings to-day.)

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed its legislative session.

Mr. WILLIS obtained the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment to present a unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield for that purpose.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I send to the desk a proposed unanimous-consent agreement which I think meets the concurrence of both sides, and if there be no objection I ask for its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be read.

The assistant secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at 1 o'clock p. m. on the fourth calendar day upon which the Senate shall be in session after January 1, 1922, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 172, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan, etc., and upon any amendment, motion, or substitute that may then be pending, or that may be offered or that may pertain thereto; that the Senate will continue such consideration to the exclusion of all other business, save only the consideration of routine morning business in the morning hour, and such other business as the Senate may by unanimous consent agree to consider, until the question is finally disposed of; and further, unless thus disposed of prior to the hour of 12 o'clock meridian on the sixth calendar day on which the Senate is in session after January 1, 1922, that from and after such day and hour no Senator shall speak for a longer period than 30 minutes on said Senate resolution 172 or upon any amendment or substitute offered thereto or any motion that may be made in connection therewith.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, just a moment.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, where the words "thirty minutes" occur it has been suggested that the language be changed to read "one hour."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator not to change the limit to 1 hour unless 30 minutes can not be agreed to. Is any Senator going to object to fixing the limit at 30 minutes?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall have no objection to fixing the time at one hour if that means that a Senator may speak but once and for one hour, but if it means that a Senator may speak for one hour several times, I shall object to the limitation being increased to one hour.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us leave the limitation at 30 minutes; that is long enough.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, do I understand that three days are to be allowed for debate before the time is reached when speeches shall be limited?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks there will be but two days of unlimited debate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator from Missouri to state precisely what the agreement now is, in order that we may all understand it.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I may say there are three things involved in the proposed unanimous-consent agreement. In the first place, up to the fourth calendar day upon which the Senate shall be in session after the 1st of January of course any Senator may speak on this matter when other matters are pending.

Mr. POMERENE. He may do so under the generally prevailing practice of the Senate.

Mr. SPENCER. He may do so under the usual practice of the Senate. On the fourth calendar day in January the resolution becomes the business of the Senate, and from the fourth calendar day of January until the sixth calendar day of January, if the Senate is in session, there will be unlimited debate.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is two days.

Mr. SPENCER. That is two days.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is not providing for taking this matter up until the 4th day of January.

Mr. SPENCER. Not to make it the unfinished business of the Senate until that time. Of course, up to that date, during the month of December, according to the practice of the Senate—

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, if that is the arrangement we shall find when we meet in December that other matters will be taken up, and there will be a desire to dispose of them, so that there will then be no debate upon this question, except probably now and then a Senator may make a speech. The result of the agreement will be that we shall have only two days of unlimited debate with this question specifically before the Senate.

Mr. SPENCER. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. As the agreement was originally framed—it was subsequently changed in order to suit the Senator from Missouri—there were three days of unlimited debate. I do not see why instead of making it the fourth calendar day it should not be made the third calendar day of January. That will afford three days of unlimited debate, commencing one day earlier.

Mr. SPENCER. Will that suit the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SIMMONS. If we are only going to have three days of unlimited debate, then I must understand that after that time has expired the limitation shall not apply except as to an hour to each Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator from North Carolina mean that a Senator may speak for one hour as often as he pleases?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. He may speak merely one hour upon the resolution and amendments.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator who mentioned the fact to me is not present, but he would not be disposed to agree to that. It is perfectly satisfactory to me, except that I do not like the provision allowing one hour; I should like to have the limit shorter; but one Senator whom I do not now see on the floor stated that he would object to the proposition as it was originally framed, that a Senator could speak but once and for only 30 minutes. The limitation as to one speech has been stricken out in order to avoid that objection. Now we run right against the other proposition that the Senator from Michigan objects if that limitation is not put in.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not object. I do not want to interfere with the original agreement. The point was made that a Senator might rise after a Senator had used 30 minutes and say something which the Senator who had exhausted his time might want to answer. While I do not like it, the provision was attached that after cloture should come into effect a Senator could speak but 30 minutes at a time, but he could speak as many 30 minutes as he pleased.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, under the rule a Senator can speak but twice on one day. If we take a recess he could only speak twice.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the first suggestion submitted as the result of a conference may be agreed to. I think the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is willing to withdraw his objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. I withdraw my objection after conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. So far as the limitation of 30 minutes is concerned, I desire to say I shall object unless the limitation is increased to one hour. No Senator can discuss this case in 30 minutes.

Mr. SPENCER. A Senator may take more than half an hour.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is nobody who can discuss this case in 30 minutes. I know enough about unanimous-consent agreements to know that the real debate is coming up after cloture is put into effect; we all know that. I am perfectly willing to assent to the unanimous-consent agreement if the time limit is made one hour.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask, if the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee is assented to, would he object to having the limitation of one hour apply from the 3d day of January? I do not like the idea of having unlimited debate for three days, and then practically unlimited debate after that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think if Senators understood the arrangement in detail as originally suggested, they would find it more satisfactory than as suggested to be modified by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that I originally made the suggestion, but, after understanding it, I think he is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from North Carolina confirms that suggestion.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall object unless the time limit is fixed at one hour.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. Let us have the proposed agreement again read.

Mr. WILLIS. I have the floor. I am perfectly willing to yield if Senators shall be able to reach some agreement, but I do not desire to yield indefinitely. I yield temporarily to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Alabama asks that the proposed agreement again be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed agreement will be again read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As originally presented the agreement reads as follows:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that at 1 o'clock p. m. on the fourth calendar day upon which the Senate shall be in session after January 1, 1922, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 172, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan, etc., and upon any amendment, motion, or substitute that may then be pending or that may be offered or that may pertain thereto; that the Senate will continue such consideration to the exclusion of all other business, save only the consideration of routine morning business in the morning hour and such other business as the Senate may, by unanimous consent, agree to consider, until the question is finally disposed of; and, further, unless thus disposed of prior to the hour of 12 o'clock m. on the sixth calendar day on which the Senate is in session after January 1, 1922, that from and after such day and hour no Senator shall speak for a longer period than 30 minutes on said Senate resolution 172 or upon any amendment or substitute offered thereto or any motion that may be made in connection therewith.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to know if the Senate understands that a Senator may speak 30 minutes upon the resolution itself and then 30 minutes upon the resolution of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] or any amendment that may be offered.

Mr. SPENCER. That is the understanding of those who drew the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. That 30 minutes should be allowed upon any amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I recall, Mr. President, that under the procedure followed in connection with the last two unanimous-consent agreements entered into two or three Senators took up all the time. I am not going to mention their names; we all know who they are. We know that that precise thing will be done. It is impossible to discuss this case in 30 minutes; in fact it is impossible to discuss it in twice that time. Let anybody who thinks he can discuss the case in that time try it after going over the record. I think an hour is a reasonable time, and if the Senator from Missouri will change the 30 minutes to one hour, I will be perfectly willing to agree, but otherwise I shall object.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me suggest that by common consent it was understood that the fourth calendar day should be made the third calendar day.

Mr. SPENCER. Not if the limitation is changed from 30 minutes to an hour.

Mr. POMERENE. I know that was the agreement as it was originally framed. I have no objection to either one of those days, so far as I am concerned, if we may so arrange.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that it is very important that a unanimous-consent agreement be reached, if possible, for otherwise the Senator from Ohio, who is the ranking member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, will be compelled to come back from Haiti where he is about to go to discharge an important public duty, or he will be compelled to resign from the committee which is to visit Haiti.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that, and I want some arrangement to be made in regard to this matter. I am very fond of the Senator from Ohio, and I would do almost anything to accommodate him, but I know from experience, as does the Senator from Utah and as all other Senators do, that when the case is finally taken up it will be within the hour rule, and whenever that is done there are certain Senators who will take up all the time. We know that that has happened time and time again. I have given my consent for the last time to an agreement which will permit one or two Senators to occupy all the time.

Mr. SPENCER. I suggest that the words "thirty minutes" be changed to "one hour," if the Senator from Tennessee demands that; otherwise that the agreement may stand as submitted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On what calendar day—the third calendar day?

Mr. SPENCER. No; the fourth calendar day, the agreement to stand as it was originally, with the exception of changing "thirty minutes" to "one hour."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the agreement as modified? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

Mr. SPENCER. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

TAX REVISION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I have been on the floor for a considerable portion of the time this morning, but other Senators have graciously occupied the time. I do not complain about that, because I merely wish to make a few brief observations touching the conference report. The conference report is, I suppose, not entirely satisfactory to anybody. Since rising to speak there have come to my mind some lines that I read somewhere:

Who'er thinks a faultless piece to see,
Thinks what ne'er was, nor is, nor e'er shall be.

Those lines are probably applicable to legislation.

I am not one of those who think the measure now presented to us is a bad one. I think on the whole it embodies very good legislation, though many of its provisions are unsatisfactory to me; it contains very much more of good than ought to be commended than there is of evil that ought to be criticized. Consequently, when the conference report comes to a vote, since under the rules it can not be amended, I shall support it, and yet I do not desire it to proceed to a final roll call without making some observations, particularly in regard to one or two matters in connection with this proposed legislation which I think are exceedingly unfortunate and unwise.

It will be remembered by some Senators that when the bill was under discussion some of us made rather an active fight for the protection of what we regarded as the legitimate interests of the building and loan associations. There was a provision on that subject in the Senate bill at pages 85 and 86. The language of that provision, as finally amended by the committee, is:

Domestic building and loan associations substantially all the business of which is confined to making loans to members.

That is all that relates especially to building and loan associations.

I thought then, and I think now, that that was and is a fair provision. I therefore did what I could to prevent the adoption of amendments which seemed to me to be directed particularly with hostile intent against the building and loan associations of the country; but I am unable to understand—speaking thus, I say, as one friendly to the building and loan associations—the action of the conferees with reference to another amendment which is found in the printed copy now before us at page 40.

The House bill provided as an exemption—

So much of the amount received by an individual as dividends or interest from domestic building and loan associations operated exclusively for the purpose of making loans to members as does not exceed $500.

So far as I am concerned, I think the practice of making exemptions is an unwise and a dangerous one. The majority of the Senate was of that opinion, and consequently, when we reached that provision in the House bill, it was stricken out. However, the conferees in their wisdom have inserted a provision as follows—I am referring to the statement made in the conference report, which says:

The House bill provided that individuals should not be required to include in their gross income so much of the amount received by them as dividends or interest from domestic building and loan associations operated exclusively for the purpose of making loans to members, as does not exceed $500.

The Senate amendment strikes out the provision of the House bill. That, as I recall, was adopted here practically unanimously, without a record vote. Now the House recedes with an amendment permitting the exclusion from gross incomes of an amount of such dividends or interest not in excess of $300, provided that this exclusion from gross income shall only be in effect from January 1, 1922, until January 1, 1927.

Mr. President, I think that is an unwise provision. I am anxious to hear some explanation of that from the conferees, and I trust that when I have concluded my brief remarks some one of the conferees will explain why that action was taken.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. WILLIS. I shall be glad to hear from the Senator from Utah at this time, if he cares to speak now.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will do so later if the Senator desires.

Mr. WILLIS. I would just as soon have the Senator do so now.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that his position is exactly the same as my position on this item.

Mr. WILLIS. I think, on the whole, it would be better if the Senator would express his views just now, in connection with what I have said. I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Ohio is correct as to the action taken by the Senate, and it was a very wise action on the part of the Senate to strike out that provision. When we got into conference, the House insisted upon their provision. It was passed over as one of the disputed points by the conferees when we were first reading the bill for consideration of the different amendments. The second time that we went over the bill it was passed over. The Senate would not yield to the House on that item. The third and last time that we went through the bill to see if we could agree upon it there was a proposition of a compromise, cutting down the $500 to $300. That was almost the last amendment that was compromised upon, and I want to say frankly to the Senator from Ohio that it was a compromise. The House conferees positively refused, unless we did compromise, to agree to the Senate amendment, and a majority of the Senate conferees agreed to that compromise.

Mr. President, I think it is an outrage. It is unjust. It can not be defended, in my opinion; but we had to yield or have no report. This is what it means:

Six per cent on $5,000 is $300. Therefore, if a man and his wife and six children want to invest $5,000 each in these associations, they can have an exemption of the income from $40,000.

Mr. POMERENE. And his sisters and cousins and aunts.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and, as the Senator from Ohio suggests, his sisters and cousins and aunts. There is no limit. It is only adding another burden to the Government by allowing investment in tax-exempt securities other than those of the States and of the Nation; and I will say to the Senator that the Senate conferees really had to yield to it with that compromise of $300 in place of $500.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator from Utah for his explanation; and I do not doubt the loyalty and the ability and the activity of the Senate conferees in defending the position of the Senate. My only regret is that they found it necessary to accept this compromise.

While I am on that subject I want to say that I have received, as I think a number of Senators have received, numerous letters and telegrams bearing upon this proposition. Here is one from the Ohio Bankers' Association. In that telegram they call attention to the fact that the effect of this legislation undoubtedly will be to cause the wholesale transfer of large sums of money from banks and trust companies to building and loan associations. Attention is also called to the fact that this amendment inserted by the committee of conference will be of practical benefit only to holders of large blocks of stock in building and loan associations and will not benefit the small shareholder at all. It furnishes a convenient means for tax dodging. I hold no brief for banks or trust companies or building and loan associations. If anybody wants to make transfers of his deposits from one to another, that is all right; that is his own business; but I do not think it is the business of Congress so to legislate as to make such transfers practically inevitable. I think we ought to have kept out of that transaction. If the conference report had come back here as the bill passed the Senate, the provisions would have been in such form as to be fair not only to the building and loan associations but also to the banks and trust companies.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Perhaps the most fundamental rule of taxation is that it should be uniform. It is very difficult to see any distinction in principle between savings invested in building and loan associations and savings invested in savings banks—perhaps mutual institutions organized not for profit, but merely for the benefit of their members, who in most instances are people of small means, who have small savings, and who invest them in savings banks as a matter of thrift. The country is interested in encouraging that mode of savings. It is also interested in building and loan associations. There are many people of small means, perhaps those who are building a house to be used as a home, a place of residence for a family, who invest their money in building and loan associations; but in the consideration of these two different methods of saving I fail to see why a preference should be given to one as against another in the matter of taxation; and I should be very much interested if the Senator from Ohio will permit him to do so, if the Senator from Utah would briefly state the ground upon which that discrimination is made, which seems to me to violate the fundamental principles of taxation.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator from Utah desires to respond further, I will yield to him; but I think he has already answered the question of the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood him to say that the House of Representatives simply refused to yield, but he did not state the reasons which they gave for this rather surprising position.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the reason given was that if we exempted this investment from tax upon the interest, money would flow into this particular line of endeavor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How did the conferees justify a system of taxation which would cause money to flow into that particular line when the owners of the money might want to put it into some other line, which they had just as much right to do and which is just as much in the interest of public economy, thrift, and general welfare as putting it into a building and loan association?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt that the Senator is absolutely correct. I can not see any defense at all for it; but in order to reach an agreement on this bill that compromise was made.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, since I have quoted from this telegram, I ask permission to incorporate it as a portion of my remarks. It is a telegram from the Ohio Bankers' Association.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The telegram is as follows:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, November 22, 1921.

HON. FRANK B. WILLIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Foregoing resolution adopted to-day:

"Whereas the Federal income tax bill passed by the House of Representatives on November 21, 1921, contains in section 213 a provision which exempts from taxable income 'so much of the amount received by an individual after December 31, 1921, and before January 1, 1927, as dividends or interest from domestic building and loan associations operated exclusively for the purpose of making loans to members as does not exceed $300'; and

"Whereas this provision if enacted into law will result in the wholesale transference of large sums of money from banks and trust companies to building and loan associations because of the large premium therein given the taxpayers for making the transfer; and

"Whereas said provision if enacted into law will act automatically and decidedly to the advantage of the taxpayers having large incomes; and

"Whereas the said provision is so manifestly discriminative in character as to make it purely class legislation; and

"Whereas the said income tax bill is now before the United States Senate for passage: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the council of administration of the Ohio Bankers' Association, That the United States Senate be requested to eliminate from the said bill this unfair, unwarranted, and grossly discriminative provision."

OHIO BANKERS' ASSOCIATION.
C. E. DUPUIS, President.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate further upon that point, but I wish to direct their attention to another amendment—amendment numbered 627. I should not like to cast my vote for this bill on the final roll call without having some explanation upon that point.

The bill as it passed the Senate provided a tax of $1.20 per wine gallon on vinous liquor, and $6.40 per gallon on distilled spirits. It provided for the doubling of taxes on liquors diverted to an unlawful purpose. It provided for the concentration of liquors in fewer Government warehouses. I want to say, by the way, that those particular amendments were not introduced here at the suggestion of any special interest.

As I recall, they were introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] at the instance of officials of the Treasury Department. Those administrative amendments were prepared in the Treasury Department to aid in the enforcement of the law and the collection of the revenues of the Government. My own judgment is that they are exceedingly wise provisions. Those are all stricken out, and we go back to the terms of the House bill.

The conferees, in their explanation at page 48, make the following statement:

The Senate amendment strikes out these provisions of the House bill and inserts three new sections, the first of which imposes a tax of 60 cents per wine gallon on intoxicating liquors, the second of which imposes a tax of $1.20 per wine gallon upon all vinous liquors, and the third of which imposes a tax of $6.40 per proof gallon upon all distilled spirits except alcohol, the result thereof being to impose this tax upon whisky withdrawn for medicinal purposes. The amendment also inserted various modifications of administrative features of the law relating to the storage and bottling of distilled spirits.

As I have just pointed out, the administrative provisions were suggested by the experts of the Treasury Department. The conferees have agreed absolutely to wipe out the amendments that were written by the Senate and to accept the House provision.

Another thing in that connection to which I wish to direct particular attention is this fact: I find from the Treasury Department that the amount of spirituous liquors withdrawn from warehouses during the last year, ending June 30, was as follows:

From distillery warehouses, 2,443,897 gallons; bottled in bond, tax paid, 5,000,000 gallons plus; withdrawn from general bonded warehouses, 1,500,000 gallons plus; a total of about 9,500,000 gallons. So much for the spirituous liquors.

The increased taxation provided by the Senate amendment was about $4 a gallon. It is a very easy matter to compute the returns under that tax. Multiply $4 by 9,000,000 and you will find about how much revenue is involved. In fairness I want to say, however, that the Treasury experts have advised that the probable loss in revenue would not be that great, due to various causes, but that it would be at least $20,000,000. My own opinion is—though I hesitate to express it in the face of expert opinion—that that estimate is much too low. From the figures as to the production of vinous liquors last year we find that the total amount of wine produced was 19,000,000 gallons; that there were 27,000,000 gallons on hand on June 30, 1921; and that on June 30, 1920, there were on hand 17,000,000 gallons. In other words, there are now on hand 10,000,000 gallons more than were on hand at the same time last year. The tax collected on such wines last year is something like $2,000,000.

I venture the assertion that as a result of this action by the conferees we have thrown away at least $30,000,000. We have made an effort to reduce taxation. We have not been able to reduce it as we would like because of the necessities of the Government, yet it is proposed to reduce these liquor taxes $30,000,000. Why? At a time when in order to get the revenue to meet the necessary expenses of the Government it is found necessary to retain very many taxes which all of us would like to get rid of I wonder why this special favor should be granted to the distillery interests of this country. It was not granted by the Senate. As I have indicated, by the action of the conferees at least $30,000,000, if not $40,000,000, will be lost to the Government, and while I expect to vote for this report, because it can not be amended and because the bill has very much more of good in it than of bad, I think this provision should not have been enacted. I think this liquor is a luxury upon which we might very well have kept the tax, and I very much regret that this $30,000,000 has been thrown away. This action of the conferees is a great benefit to those who have these liquors to sell, but it necessitates added burdens on other taxpayers and deprives the Government of at least $30,000,000 of sorely needed revenue. The Senate amendments should have been kept in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I assure the Senator from Ohio that a majority of the conferees on the part of the Senate insisted with all the power at their command on keeping the Senate provision in the bill, for it meant at least $25,000,000 revenue. So far as I am concerned, I would have kept that $25,000,000 for the Government, and I would have eliminated an equal amount of the little nagging, irritating taxes; but the House insisted upon the provision found in the conference report.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from Utah is at liberty to do so, will he not give us the ground taken by the House conferees in regard to this matter?

Mr. SMOOT. They insisted it was wrong to impose a tax of $6.40 a gallon upon liquors which may be sold in a drug store for beverage purposes. That was the basis of their opposition to the Senate provision. They did not want to tax whisky sold by a drug store as a beverage, because they designated it as medicine.

Mr. STERLING. Of course, the House conferees knew that under the law it could not be sold in a drug store for beverage purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. They claimed that where vinous liquors are sold upon prescription they are to be drunk, and therefore they are for beverage purposes; and I think that is the ruling of the department.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I understand, if a man has a certain amount of money which he desires to invest and buys Liberty bonds, which return him $300, he has to pay taxes on that income. If he puts his money in a savings bank and it returns him $300 interest, he has to pay an income tax on that; but if he loans it to a building and loan association and it returns him $300, he does not have to pay a tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is not the amendment now under discussion; that amendment has already been considered; but I will say to the Senator that the statement he has just made is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Referring to that, then, I inquire of the Senator if the conferees took into consideration the question as to whether that does not violate the rule of uniformity laid down in the Constitution?

Mr. SMOOT. I hardly think it does, because of the fact that it applies to all such organizations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; but upon what ground can a distinction be made between money loaned to a building and loan association and money loaned to a savings bank?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senate conferees had had their way, that provision never would have been put back into the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely rose to inquire whether the constitutional requirement of uniformity was taken into consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. It was not taken into consideration or spoken of in the conference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It occurs to me that there is no ground for saying there is any difference between lending money to a building and loan association and putting it in a savings bank.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator absolutely.

Referring now to the remarks made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], if it had been known that the Senate provision would have the effect of raising the price of whisky sold for beverage purposes by a drug store, there might have been a little excuse for the House provision; but taking into consideration that over 100 per cent profit is made upon every half pint of whisky that is sold in a drug store on a prescription, I think the objection to the Senate provision was far fetched. The result of it will be that not only will the bootleggers in this country continue to make enormous profits out of the people who are compelled to use the liquor for medicinal purposes, but it will permit the retailer to continue to make the outrageous profits he has been making. Only the other day a Senator called attention to the fact that at one of the drug stores in the District of Columbia he had to pay $3.75 for a half pint of whisky which he had to have in a case of sickness, which I assert did not cost the druggist more than a dollar and a quarter with all the taxes added and with all the profit of making it taken into consideration. Even allowing for exorbitant profits, the druggist did not pay more than a dollar and a quarter for it, and he sold it at $3.75 a half pint.

Is it necessary for us to concern ourselves over the question of relieving such business from taxation? I doubt it, as did the other conferees on the part of the Senate. But we did the best we could to get an agreement, and it was necessary for the Senate conferees to join in this agreement in order to be able to present the conference report to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIS. My attention was temporarily diverted. Did the Senator state that the Senate conferees were of the same opinion which he has now so clearly expressed?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate conferees stood for the Senate amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. And the agreement which resulted was found necessary in order to get any bill at all?

Mr. SMOOT. In order to get an agreement.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, my colleague a few moments ago called attention to the exemptions from the income tax of the dividends or interest on stock in building and loan associations. I realize that there has been considerable sentiment in favor of such a provision. As I have stated once before in the course of debate on the bill, I think perhaps we have more capital invested in building and loan associations in Ohio than is so invested in any other State of the Union. The question came up as to whether or not such building and loan associations should be taxed. Both my colleague and I were against the exemption of building and loan associations from taxation.

Some time ago a resolution was passed by some of the building and loan associations of the State of Ohio asking for the $500 exemption contained in the original House text. I was opposed to it then, and I am opposed to any exemption of that character at the present time, and I may say that I think the best advised building and loan association people in the State of Ohio do not favor that exemption.

This question is going to rise to plague the Congress, in my judgment. Think of the situation. We may have in the same city or town a savings bank, and a building and loan association which is receiving deposits, it may be, or selling stock, both of them of vital importance to the community. But under this amendment, if any man has any deposits in the savings bank, or any stock of the savings bank, his income derived therefrom is subject to the tax, and the temptation will be to take his deposits out of the savings bank and put them into the building and loan association, or to sell his stock in the savings bank and put the money in the building and loan association. If this were hedged about by any limitations there might be some possible excuse for it, but any tax dodger can invest $5,000 of his funds in building and loan association stock for himself, another $5,000 for his wife, and another $5,000 for each of his children, and it would result in another tax-exempt security being added to the billions which we have now. That is the vice of it. I think I am right when I make the statement that the only people who have favored the exemption are the rich stockholders of the building and loan associations.

It is represented to Senators that this is done for the benefit of the workingman. Has anyone received any communication from any workingman asking that this be done? I have received none, and my mail is usually crowded with communications of all kinds when proposed legislation relates to a tax measure of this sort.

Now, what is the situation? If one of his neighbors or friends were to come to a Senator and ask his advice about building a house now, is there any Senator who would advise the building of a house at the present price of labor and material? As a result of the provision which I am discussing, those who are interested will be going around trying to encourage workmen to build houses. The workman will be required to give a mortgage and will get for $3,000 a house that probably would cost him about $1,600 in normal times. That is going to be the trouble. This provision, in my judgment, is not going to benefit the workman.

Mr. President, there are a good many provisions in the bill with which I am not content, and one of them is the taxation of corporations in the way it is proposed to be done, increasing the tax of the corporation of low earning power and cutting off and relieving from taxation the corporation of high earning power. When it comes to the income tax and the different brackets, except that the exemption of the taxpayer is increased $500 for those who have net incomes of less than $5,000 and except the change in some of the higher brackets, there is little or no relief for the taxpayer who earns from $5,000 to $68,000. And now we have added another exemption for the benefit of those who have large means. It will not affect the rank and file of the American people.

For one I shall not vote for the conference report. I do not think it can be defended. The best thing we have heard said about it is a statement made by one of the Senators sponsoring the bill that it is a temporary measure, or something to that effect. I wish it were so temporary that it would expire before it went into operation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on yesterday in making a speech in the Senate I asked the privilege of inserting in the RECORD a certain table with reference to the taxes which would be paid under the provisions of the bill on incomes by individuals, partnerships, and corporations, which table had been prepared for me by the actuary of the Treasury, Mr. McCoy. That permission was granted. Mr. McCoy stated to me this morning that he had made a mistake in his estimate as to the amount which would be paid by corporations; that he had unfortunately and inadvertently included in his estimate of the tax which would be paid by stockholders on their dividends a normal tax which individuals pay, which ought to have been eliminated, and which elimination would have made the tax paid by corporations much less than he estimated in his table which I placed in the RECORD. I now desire to ask that I may be permitted to have placed in the permanent RECORD a table furnished me by Mr. McCoy this morning as a substitute for the table which I placed in the RECORD on yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Without objection, the request of the Senator from North Carolina is granted.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the tax bill is a disappointment to the people of the country, particularly the men who have looked forward to its enactment in the hope that it would inspire the business men of America to renewed activity.

Previous to the war we had no knowledge of income taxes, excess-profits taxes, corporation and other taxes as we have learned to appreciate them since 1917, and when the war was over it was the comforting expectation that these taxes would be modified in a way that would enable men to regain confidence in business and to take the risk of loss and gain.

It is easy enough to say that the rich should stand the burden; that if a man makes a half a million dollars he can afford to give three-quarters of it to the Government. That has been the trouble; we have forced ourselves here to believe that the American people have been beguiled by this sort of talk when facts tell us that there has been an extraordinary business depression; millions of men are out of work, and the winter is approaching with no prospect for many of them securing the bare necessities of life.

These people have come to understand that unless there is real activity in business the working men and women of the country are the first to suffer. Is it, Mr. President, that we lack the capacity to visualize this situation, or do we actually believe that the best way to serve the country is by saying to the man who has extended his business and is earning a profit that he must pay in taxes three-fourths of what he makes? Over and over again during the debate on this bill we have told the story of how men with large incomes have escaped taxation by investment in tax-exempt securities, while those in active business, whose capital was required to finance their enterprises, have been met with an almost confiscatory tax.

When this bill becomes a law there will be no inspiring confidence on the part of the country which will assure a business revival. I shall vote for it, because it is better than the present law, but I shall at once urge its further revision.

I voted in the Senate for a maximum surtax of 32 per cent. I voted against the 15 per cent corporation tax. If I had my way it would have been 10 per cent. I shall vote for this bill only, Mr. President, because, as I said before, it will be an improvement upon the present law. We have done away with the transportation tax, and we have repealed practically all of the so-called luxury taxes. We have cut down surtaxes 15 per cent. We have reduced the taxes on all smaller incomes. We have abolished the excess-profits tax. This much is an improvement over the present law.

I regret that the Senate conferees did not insist upon the retention of the provision in the bill increasing the tax on whisky. Here was an opportunity to secure for the Government revenue aggregating approximately $25,000,000 per year. At the present tax of $2.20 per gallon we are paying double the price for whisky for medicinal purposes than we did when the tax was $6.40 per gallon. As I have indicated, the increase in the price of whisky, even with this additional tax, would have been so small that it would not have been noticeable, and I can not possibly conceive why the Senate conferees were willing to give way to the House on this question.

I shall offer a bill to-day authorizing the appointment of a commission to study this whole question of internal taxation and report to the Congress at the earliest possible moment. The appointment of such a commission would do much to convince the people that Congress is desirous of enacting legislation that will be really comprehensive and founded upon economic principles that will be sound and enduring.

Mr. President, in this connection, I ask unanimous consent out of order to introduce the bill to which I have referred, and I request that it may be read by the Secretary and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2771) to create a tax-investigative commission was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established a commission, to be known as the tax-investigative commission (hereinafter in this act referred to as the "commission"), and to be composed of nine members, as follows:

- (a) Three members who shall be Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate;
- (b) Three members who shall be Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives; and
- (c) Three members who shall represent the public, to be appointed by the President.

Any vacancy in the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. The members representing the public shall serve without compensation, except reimbursement for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred in the performance of the duties vested in the commission by this act. The members who are Members of the Senate and House of Representatives shall serve without compensation in addition to that received for their services as Members of the Congress.

The Secretary of the Treasury shall furnish the commission with such clerical assistance, quarters, stationery, furniture, office equipment, and other supplies as may be necessary for the performance of the duties vested in the commission by this act.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the commission—

- (a) To investigate the effect upon Federal revenues of tax-exempt State and municipal securities, and possible methods of Federal taxation of such securities;
- (b) To investigate the effect of the existing differences in law between the Federal taxation of individuals and partnerships and of corporations;
- (c) To investigate the taxation of expenditures and the reduction of the tax rates upon savings, as means for raising revenue, stimulating thrift, and redistributing the burdens of taxation;
- (d) To investigate the effect of income and profits taxes upon the accumulation and investment of liquid capital; and
- (e) To make from time to time such recommendations as it deems advisable pursuant to such investigations, and to report on or before the first Monday in December of each year to the President and to the Congress as to its activities.

SEC. 3. That the expenditures of the commission shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by the commission and signed by the chairman thereof. Reimbursement under the provisions of section 1 of the members representing the public shall be made out of moneys in the Treasury of the United States. All other expenditures of the commission shall be paid one-third out of the contingent fund of the Senate, one-third out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and one-third out of moneys in the Treasury of the United States. For the expenditures of the commission which are to be paid out of moneys in the Treasury of the United States there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000.

SEC. 4. That the commission shall cease to exist on December 31, 1922.

Mr. POMERENE subsequently said: Mr. President, I did not understand what action was called for on the bill presented by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York introduced a bill which has been referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMERENE. That is all right. I thought the Senator was asking for action on the matter.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it seems to me that it is advisable at this time in a very brief way to call attention to the situation as it exists in this Congress regarding the pending bill.

I believe it will be generally conceded that this is the most important measure which could come before Congress in a time of peace. We are now dealing with conditions which have been brought about by reason of the World War. We find ourselves confronted with a very large, heavy burden in order to meet the exigencies of the Government at this time. Heretofore I have dwelt especially upon the fact that at such a time the principles of taxation should be well recognized and scrupulously applied so as to place the burden of Government where it should justly be borne.

We devoted considerable time to the discussion of this bill. I believe that the divergence of thought as to legislation of this sort was very well marked in the Senate, and that the country very well understands the reasons which actuated the various Members of this body in their action upon the measure. The bill has been passed through the Senate and has now come back to us from the committee of conference. That committee was composed, of course, of the leaders of this body as well as those of the other body. We can, I believe, now reasonably appraise the sentiment and the thought which actuate legislation of this kind in the minds of those who control the Congress. Upon the Finance Committee of the Senate and upon the Ways and Means Committee of the House we find the great leaders of the majority party in control of this legislation, and the bill as it comes to us now is stamped with the thought and the characteristics which that leadership represents. We are now able, therefore, to appraise that thought and that sentiment and ascertain the controlling principle which actuates such legislation in the Congress of the United States at this time.

This bill contains several titles, but only a few of them are very important. In connection with the excise taxes, the taxes upon doing business, the taxes upon luxuries, and the transportation taxes there is no special principle involved. They are looked to for the purpose of revenue production solely because of their peculiar situation and the fact that revenue can be raised from them.

A special tax upon luxuries has been looked upon as a proper source for raising revenue at this time. We now have a tax upon transportation. We felt that that should be removed. It has been removed and the country will be gratified with that result. Some of the excise taxes have been eliminated, and that will meet with the approval of the country. Other excise taxes remain, and I suppose almost all of us would be glad to get rid of many of those; but, so far as they are actually taxes upon luxuries, a great many of us felt that they might be retained at this time in order to contribute something to the support of the Government. Those, however, are not the important features of this bill; they are mere incidents in connection with legislation of this character.

The great amount of revenue to be raised by the Government at this time must come from taxation upon incomes and from estate or inheritance taxes, whatever you may choose to call them. It is to those features of the bill that we must look to discover the principle which is actuating the Congress at this time, and I take it, Mr. President, that there will be no difficulty in getting that bird's-eye view and perspective of this legislation which will enable us to understand just exactly what the leadership in this Congress means and how that leadership wants the taxes of this country borne by the people of the country.

The principle which ought to prevail is that the burden of taxes should be imposed upon those who are best able to pay and who can pay with the least burden. If I may say it, the sacrifice which is to be borne by the citizen should in some way be equalized, and it is evident that that can not be done by making everybody pay a tax at the same rate. In every country of which I have any knowledge where an income tax has been resorted to for the purpose of raising governmental revenue the principle has been recognized that there should be a graduated tax; that those having the highest income should pay a higher rate of taxation.

Now, with that in view, let us examine this bill and see what has been done. We find that upon individual incomes above the exemption on the first $4,000 there is levied a flat tax of 4 per cent. A married man, with an exemption of $2,000, having an income of $6,000, must pay 4 per cent upon that as a flat normal tax, so called. In addition to that, on the amount between $5,000 and $6,000 he must pay an additional tax of 1 per cent. When his income rises above $6,000 he pays a flat tax or a normal tax of 8 per cent and an additional tax of 2 per cent, making 10 per cent upon his income between $6,000 and $8,000. When his income reaches $10,000 and a little above, then he pays at the rate of 12 per cent. So we have the man who has an individual income of a little over $10,000 paying at the rate of 12 per cent. Everybody with an income of that magnitude pays at that rate.

I submit that a normal tax, a flat tax of 8 per cent on the amount above $6,000, does not recognize the rule of having the taxpayer pay who is best able to pay. The normal tax is too great; it imposes too great a burden upon the people of average means.

Mr. President, when we compare individual income taxes with the provision of this bill imposing taxes upon corporations, what do we find? We find that under the bill as it is now presented here no corporation in the country, regardless of the amount of its income, regardless of its percentage of profit, is called upon to pay at any time more than 12½ per cent. So we put the individual with a meager income of $10,000 a year upon the same basis practically, lacking the one-half per cent, with the profiteering corporations of the country. That will be the effect of this bill.

Now, let us see what the conferees did in regard to this, how they viewed the situation, and what they did to remedy it. As the bill was passed by the Senate it imposed a flat tax on corporations of 15 per cent. Senators will recall that I criticized that provision as being unjust, stating that it bore heavily upon the corporations which were making small incomes, that it increased their taxes by 50 per cent, while it reduced the taxes upon corporations making high profits upon their invested capital.

Now, let us see what the Senate conferees did and how they viewed that situation. When the Senate came to consider the question of the surtax upon individuals they increased that tax from 32 per cent, as provided by the House, to 50 per cent. When the bill reached conference, let us see what happened; let us see how the representatives of the Senate, how the leaders of the majority party in Congress, the spokesmen for those who shall say what the taxes of the people shall be, dealt with that situation. Let us see if we can find in their report something to indicate that they are willing to stand upon the fundamental principles of justice which should pervade the levying of every income tax.

Yesterday afternoon the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. PENROSE] had read from the desk a statement of what the conferees had done. I presume it was not well understood at the time; Senators had no opportunity to study it. Probably it is printed in the Record this morning, but I think it well enough to call attention to that report which the chairman of the Finance Committee, who is also the chairman of the conferees, made to the Senate and ascertain if we can whether or not there was that spirit manifest in the committee of conference which the Senate wanted to prevail for the purpose of finally settling upon the bill which should become the law.

I read from that statement of the chairman of the committee:

On the vital question of income-tax rates an adjustment in the nature of a compromise is recommended. The managers on the part of the House accepted (under instructions) the Senate schedule of surtax rates applicable to individuals. The Senate conferees, in return, accepted the House rate of 12½ per cent applicable to corporations.

Mr. President, what spirit is manifested in that very first sentence as it comes from the conferees? The House, by its own action, accepted the amendment which the Senate had put upon the bill with reference to individual surtaxes. The House had control of its conferees; but now we are told that "in return," and as a mere matter of compromise, the conferees have accepted the original House provision for only a tax of 12½ per cent upon corporations.

Mr. President, they absolutely ignored the sentiment of this body which was behind the raise of the surtaxes upon individuals. It was felt in this Chamber that those surtaxes were not high enough, and so they were raised from 32 per cent to 50 per cent. What did that mean? Did it not mean that this body felt that taxes upon incomes should be raised rather than lowered? A tremendous effort was made in this body to have an excess-profits tax put upon corporations. At any rate, no one here felt that the tax on corporations would be reduced below the 15 per cent, but, as stated here, "in return" for the acceptance by the House of the Senate amendment upon surtaxes, what did they do? Did they devise some means of making corporations pay a little more, as the Senate had required individuals to pay? Not at all; but they went to the other extreme, and actually reduced the taxes upon corporations in return for what? The mandate of the House was that the taxes were not high enough on these incomes; and in return for the House putting it a little higher and meeting the Senate our conferees very complacently say: "We will reduce the taxes upon corporations from 15 to 12½ per cent."

What spirit animated that conference body which caused it to do any such thing as that? Did they catch the spirit from anything done here, or was it caught from the zephyrs that came by from other and outside sources?

The comment upon that is as follows:

This reduction of 2½ per cent from the proposed Senate rate on corporations will reduce the tax burden on business—and correspondingly reduce the revenue in the first instance—by $110,000,000 a year. * * * The lower rate will be particularly reassuring to public utility companies and thousands of other corporations which are now earning only 3 or 4 per cent, or less, on the capital invested.

Mr. President, when did the change come over the spirit of their dreams? We talked here until we were red in the face about the injustice which was being done these public utilities. We tried to bring some relief to them. We tried to demonstrate that the bill as it came out of the Finance Committee of the Senate increased their taxes by 50 per cent and levied upon the transportation of the country a burden which must ultimately be paid by those who patronize the public utilities. We called attention to that, and they listened with deaf ears; and now only for the purpose of furnishing some excuse do they turn to the public utilities of the country and point to the corporations which are only earning 3 or 4 per cent upon their invested capital. Was that the reason? Was that the reason? Is it an excuse? Because what becomes of those profiteering corporations, thousands of them, as was shown here by the evidence, earning 100, 200, and more per cent upon their invested capital? They failed to call attention to the fact that while they are reducing the taxes upon these public utilities they are also reducing taxes upon the others.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to inquire of the Senator from what source the loss of revenue to the extent of $110,000,000 by reason of the reduction in the corporation tax has been made up?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It is not made up by anything that the conferees did.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then, if that is the case, either there will be a deficiency to the extent of $100,000,000 in the revenue or else the bill as framed in the Senate produced $100,000,000 of revenue more than was necessary.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Evidently the Senator's conclusion follows in the alternative. I will state, however, that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] in his statement calls attention to the fact that on the 1st of November the President wrote a letter saying that he had found a means of raising $94,000,000 from some other source, through the sale of railroad securities and some other things, thus making it unnecessary to do this and demonstrating, if the Senator please, that this whole legislation at this time is of a haphazard character of the very worst sort.

As I have previously stated, we passed a budget bill here—a bill which was lauded from one end of this country to the other. It was said that the time had now come when some system should be put into the affairs of the Government, when some business sense should be put into it; that we would have our budget, we would have our official estimate of the necessities of the Government, and then we would frame revenue legislation to meet those necessities, and meet them no more and no less. But what do we find here now? In view of this great, exalted idea which has been sent abroad over the country as political propaganda, we find the whole thing overturned, and here at the last minute the chairman of the Finance Committee, coming in from the committee of conference, tells us about a letter from the President of the United States to some one, we know not whom—

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to interrupt him. I want to say to the Senator from Montana that because of the fact that most of the changes that have been made in these rates do not go into effect until the 1st day of January of this year—that is, in the middle of the present fiscal year, 1922—the deficit will not be so very great for this fiscal year. The actuary of the Treasury tells me that the bill as reported back to the Senate by the conference committee will involve a deficit for this fiscal year of possibly not over $51,000,000, but that when the bill gets into full operation, as it will be in the fiscal year 1923, there will be a deficit of $170,000,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, all of these corporations earning only 3 or 4 per cent upon their invested capital, and even up as high as 8 per cent upon their invested capital, notwithstanding this reduction, have their taxes increased by 25 per cent under this bill. Then they undertake to justify it:

And the 12½ per cent rate is a fair equivalent, or more than an equal equivalent, for the taxes paid by individuals and in effect by partnerships. More than 99 per cent of those who pay the individual as distinguished from the corporation tax will pay less than 12½ per cent on their net income under the bill as recommended.

Mr. President, what becomes of our principle of having the burden of taxation put upon those who are best able to pay? It may be true that only 1 per cent of the individual taxpayers of this country will pay an average tax of 12½ per cent. I have no means of checking up that statement; but it absolutely ignores the principle of fairness, the principle which should underlie legislation of this sort. Are you going to make the individuals who happen to pay a little less than an average of 12½ per cent upon their total income pay more simply because you put only 12½ per cent upon corporations?

Under this bill a man has an income of about $31,000 before he pays an average of 12½ per cent of it; but in the meantime what becomes of these rates which they are paying? After you get above $10,000 you are paying 12 per cent; after you get above $14,000 you are paying 13 per cent; above $16,000, 14 per cent; above $18,000 you are paying at the rate of 20 per cent; and I should like to know what sympathy the leadership in this body, the leaders of the conference committee, the leaders of the great Finance Committee, have for those individual taxpayers, in view of what they have done in this bill.

Mr. President, that is exemplified by the following language in this statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania:

And, as part of the same general compromise, the Senate conferees agreed to that provision of the House bill which debars or excludes corporations from the benefits of a reduced rate on capital gains. The Senate plan in effect taxed capital gains at 40 per cent of the rates applicable to ordinary or other income. This would have meant in the case of individuals a maximum tax on capital gains of over 23 per cent—

That is, if the capital gains belonged to a man with a net income of over $200,000, as to him it would have amounted to 23 per cent—that is, 40 per cent of the maximum individual tax of 58 per cent. A tax of 23 per cent is high enough to freeze up or prevent capital transactions of the kind which, for the sake of the revenue, it is desired to encourage.

But in the case of corporations the Senate method would have taxed capital gains at only 5 per cent—that is, 40 per cent of the corporation tax of 12½ per cent. This discrimination or difference between the individual and corporation taxes on capital gains impressed the conferees as extreme; and accordingly—in consideration of the lower rate of 12½ per cent on ordinary corporation income—it is recommended that the privilege of paying a reduced rate on capital gains be confined, as in the House bill, to individuals; and that individuals electing to utilize this provision be permitted to include in capital gains profits derived from the sale of stock in corporations.

That is a very seductive statement. This is the privilege conferred upon individuals; if they make capital gains, either in the disposition of real estate or even in the sale of stocks and bonds, they are to have a reduction in their taxes. But let us see what individuals are brought within the terms of the bill. Upon page 23 of the bill as it comes from the conference committee I find this provision:

In the case of any taxpayer (other than a corporation) who for any taxable year derives a capital net gain there shall (at the election of the taxpayer) be levied, collected, and paid, in lieu of the taxes imposed by sections 210 and 211 of this title—

Those are the normal and surtax provisions of the bill.

A tax determined as follows:

I ask the attention of Senators to this:

A partial tax shall first be computed upon the basis of the ordinary net income at the rates and in the manner provided in sections 210 and 211, and the total tax shall be this amount plus 12½ per cent of the capital net gain; but if the taxpayer elects to be taxed under this section the total tax shall in no such case be less than 12½ per cent of the total net income.

Who will get the benefit of that provision? Only the man who pays a total tax on his net income of 12½ per cent, and that is the individual with an income of $31,000 or more. So we have this provision in the bill, and we felt that it was necessary to reduce the taxes upon capital gain, and if a man sold his house or his ranch at a profit, or sold his factory at a profit, or sold any other capital at a profit, he should not have to consider all of that profit as gain during the one taxable year. Therefore the Senate provided that in such case he should consider only 40 per cent of those gains, in making his income tax return.

That applied to everybody, as it was passed by the Senate. The man who bought a home for $5,000 and sold it for $6,000 under the Senate provision would have to pay a tax upon only 40 per cent of the thousand dollars gain. It was enlarged in the Senate, over the objection of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROTH] as I understand, so as to include stock transactions.

Now, in all of these instances of capital gain, whether coming from the transfer of real property, or from the sale of stocks and bonds, we have a provision for relief, but it is limited to those who have incomes in excess of $31,000 a year.

Can Senators imagine a more stupendous infamy than such a proposition as that? At the time the conferees of the Senate were appointed, the Senate wanted all to participate alike in the reduction of taxation upon capital gain; but, as I think the Senate and the country will believe the conferees carried out the purpose to grant relief, through this bill, only to those who are profiteering upon the country, who have high incomes, and to put the burden upon those who are less able to pay.

Mr. KING. I would like to have the Senator tell me just how that would operate in a case such as I will illustrate. Assume a capital gain of a million dollars by some individual whose net income is two or three or four hundred thousand dollars a year. Assume the case of a farmer whose income is two or three thousand dollars a year, who has owned his farm for many years, but during the past few years, by reason of some industrial development in his neighborhood, or from other causes, it has increased in value very much, let us say 100 per cent, and he sells that farm at an advance of 100 per cent. How would the bill as it comes from the conference committee operate as to those two cases?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Unless he had a total net income of $31,000 or more, he would be taxed upon the full amount of that gain.

Mr. KING. And the man whose income was half a million, and whose capital gain was a million, would pay only—

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. He would pay only 12½ per cent tax upon the million dollars gain.

Mr. KING. I really can not understand how a conference committee, if they understood such a monstrous inequality, could have indorsed it. There must be some mistake in the Senator's computations; the conference committee must have been oblivious to the fact, or—and I can not believe it of them—they were seeking to perpetrate a wrong which can not be defended in morals.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, my only answer is, read page 23 of the bill as it comes from the conference committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, undoubtedly the result which the Senator from New Mexico has pictured is correct. No taxpayer whose income is less than $31,000 will receive any benefit from this 12½ per cent rate; that is undoubtedly so. That is brought about in this way: If allowed the 12½ per cent rate on his gains which is provided, then a man must account for his income tax separately, and it must be paid separately. If the income tax which he would have to pay is so small that the rate would be far below 12½ per cent—

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not the rate but the total tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; if the total tax should be far below that, which could only happen where the income was less than $31,000—

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then he would not be entitled to the benefit of the 12½ per cent, and he would have to pay the normal rate of income tax, and the normal rate on his gains.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And he would have to pay the surtaxes, without taking into consideration the fact that he had any capital gain. I may add that the specious reason given for the adoption of this provision is that the tax on corporations is 12½ per cent only, but it is 12½ per cent, and the poor little individual who has a small income can never, under their supervision, with any consent of theirs, get any less rate of taxation than the corporations which are profiteering upon the people of the country. That is the specious reason they give, that if it were capital gain the corporation would have to pay 12½ per cent, so, before the individual can get any benefit even of the 12½ per cent, he has to show that he is paying an average of 12½ per cent upon every dollar of his income.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator did not let me quite finish my statement. I am not defending this at all. I am simply stating the facts. A man who has an income of $31,000, including his normal income and his gain, would never have to pay a tax of over 12½ per cent, and that is the reason why a man whose income is less than $31,000 would get no benefit from this, because if you include the gain and the income, and the two reach only $31,000, then the taxpayer could never, under any circumstances, have to pay on the total over 12½ per cent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator's explanation, I think, is quite clear, and it is in accordance with this provision of the bill. But I must hurry along.

Mr. SIMMONS. While I was not defending it, I thought that should be stated in justice to the conferees.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In justice to the corporations, or to the conferees?

Mr. SIMMONS. Either way the Senator wants to put it, because I think the conferees had their minds pretty well set on the interests of corporations.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the Senator can distort his statement into a justification of the acts of the conferees, he is a greater intellectual acrobat than I am.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not say in justification. I said "in justice" to them.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Explain this as you will, while it may be in justice to the conferees, it is an injustice to the individual taxpayers of the country. Now, I desire to read another portion of the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, referring to the estate tax, as to why the Senate conferees receded on that. Many people have an idea that estate taxes should not be so very high; others think they should be high, and still others think they should be very high. I can understand that when you fix a tax rate upon estates of decedents you are doing an arbitrary thing, and that you are governed only by your own sense of justice in the matter. If the conferees had come back to the Senate and said, "We receded on the amendment increasing the tax upon estates because the House conferees felt that the House had gone far enough, and they were not willing to go any higher," no particular complaint could have been made.

But let us see what they say about it:

On two important amendments to the estate-tax title the managers on the part of the Senate were finally compelled to yield to the persuasive arguments and persistent demands of the House conferees.

Then they tell us what they were:

In Senate amendment No. 582 the estate-tax rates were increased by four new brackets, raising the present maximum rate of 25 per cent to 50 per cent. These increased rates, it was shown, could not bring in any additional revenue before the fiscal year 1924—

That was one argument. They continue—and they would, if adopted, so stimulate the distribution or partition of estates before death.

Mr. President, that was the reason. They did not want to stimulate the distribution of these estates before death. Then this follows:

A similar attitude was taken toward the proposed graduated tax on gifts. It would add in effect an entirely new tax to the present unduly extended system of Federal taxes. Moreover, gifts in contemplation of death are taxed under existing law.

That is true, if it is done within two years before the death.

In section 202(a) (2) of the proposed new revenue act both the House and Senate have approved a new provision by which in the case of property acquired by gift the basis for computing gain or loss shall be the same as that which the property would have in the hands of the donor.

Now, in regard to the estate tax, it is said that to increase the taxes upon estates will cause distribution of those estates by gift, and yet in the very next breath they take the tax off of gifts. It is said that the present tax law with reference to estates is being evaded by reason of gifts. It is said that other tax provisions are being evaded through the means of gifts. The father gives stocks and bonds to his children, dividing up the income and avoiding the high surtaxes. The gifts are made in order to avoid the inheritance tax. The Republicans complain of that now in the one breath, and in the next breath say there ought not to be any tax upon gifts. They apparently desire to leave the door open for those who have the highest inducement to avoid the payment of their just taxes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is that the persuasive argument to which the Senator referred?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is the persuasive argument. I read further:

In view of its incorporation in the law it was deemed unwise to experiment with more extreme measures and to penalize by the imposition of a new and difficult tax that distribution of fortunes, particularly the so-called "swollen fortunes," which advocates of heavy inheritance or estate taxation usually assert to be the chief aim and purpose of estate or inheritance taxation.

That is not the purpose at all except possibly in the minds of some few. What we are seeking here is to get revenue for the purpose of paying the expenses of the Government. We want the revenue to pay the debts and the running expenses of the Government.

There are many other things to which I would like to refer, but I shall detain the Senate only a few moments further.

Further along in the statement I find this:

It is not possible at this time to make an accurate forecast of the expenditures for the fiscal year 1923.

If it is impossible to know what the expenditures for 1923 are going to be, why should this bill be passed now? We could easily enough pass a bill relating to transportation taxes and the so-called excise taxes. There would be little trouble about that. It is true that the income-tax provisions of the bill do not become effective for over a year. Not until March, 1923, will anybody be called upon to make an income-tax return under the provisions of this bill. But, it is said here, it is impossible to estimate the amount of revenue which will be required. Then, I ask, Why should the bill be put through now? That, I think, is answered in another paragraph of this statement, as follows:

The revenue act of 1921 is a transitional or temporary measure.

Why?

It does not place the tax system on a stable or scientific basis.

To that I heartily agree.

But it is better than the law which it will supersede.

Mr. President, there is room for a difference of opinion there. I do not believe it will.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am not quite able to perceive the justification for the statement that this is merely a temporary and transitory measure. The Republican Party promised to the country, as soon as it came into power, a scientific, comprehensive, proper, and permanent tax law. Are we now to receive a patchwork and go through all of the trouble of preparing another tax bill in the course of a few months? Is that the policy of the Republican Party?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think I can answer that in the language of the Senator from Pennsylvania. After telling what the bill is and about the amount of revenue that it will raise and will not raise, he said:

It is, as has been said, a temporary measure. But nothing better than a temporary measure will be possible until the people of this country give to the question of Federal taxation an amount and kind of study which it has not yet received; until, in particular, the people become convinced of the sincerity and truth of the contention that the proposal to reduce excessive tax rates is not designed to relieve the rich and the profiteer, but to avert the breakdown of the income tax, unshackle business, and increase the tax revenue.

That is the reason why it is a temporary measure. It is temporary because the House had courage enough to raise the surtaxes from 32 to 50 per cent, in accordance with the views of a majority of the Senate. It is temporary because they will not let this thing rest until they reduce the surtaxes upon individual incomes. They have succeeded in destroying just taxation so far as corporations are concerned, but there is another job to be done. They want to educate the people to the point of believing that a reduction of high taxes relieves business and adds to the revenues of the country. I wonder how long they will be engaged in the attempt so to educate the people of America?

Mr. President, taking the bill as it now stands, we have the corporations paying a tax of only 12½ per cent. This may be mere camouflage. It may be that they look with some degree of serenity upon the action of the House which met the Senate in applying a surtax up to 50 per cent, but with the covert and well-understood knowledge that in the bill there is a great reservoir into which these large profits and these large incomes may safely be put and never pay over 12½ per cent. There is nothing here to prevent anybody from organizing a corporation. There is no reason why any of the wealthy men of the country should not incorporate their personal business. What is to prevent any man from organizing a corporation to deal in stocks and bonds or to deal in anything in which he has an interest? He puts the property into the corporation. He never draws out a dollar except to the extent necessary to pay his personal expenses. The balance of it remains there as a revolving fund for investment and reinvestment, and at no stage can it be taxed above 12½ per cent.

Mr. President, that is the present bill, and I should like to understand how the people of the country are ever going to be educated to accept it and the principles upon which it is based.

THE PEACE FLAG.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution upon which I think there will be no discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 176) was read, as follows:

Whereas at a meeting of the Interparliamentary Union and World's Peace Congress, peace flags of many nations have been displayed, made by adding a white border to each national flag; and
Whereas the United States flag, thus bordered as a peace flag, was carried by the first United States ship that passed through the Panama Canal, the Christobal, a flag now in the custody of the Daughters of the American Revolution at the Capital of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate hereby requests the President to authorize United States delegates at the Conference on Limitation of Armaments, now sitting at the city of Washington, to display such a flag at the conference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before that is done, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	Myers	Spencer
Brandegee	Harrison	Nelson	Sterling
Broussard	Hefflin	Nicholson	Sutherland
Bursum	Jones, N. Mex.	Norbeck	Swanson

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I caught the reading of the resolution it seemed to me that there was really no necessity for its passage. I may, however, have misunderstood it, and I therefore ask that the resolution may again be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I repeat that it seems to me there is no necessity for the passage of this resolution. If it be desired that the flag shall be bound with a white border that might be done without any action such as is here proposed on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Utah that I am advised that appeal having been made to the authorities for permission to do what is here desired, they replied by saying, "We can not consent without some authorization from one or the other House of Congress." This emblem, signifying the activities of world organizations or world assemblages the purpose of which was to promote peace, has been in use for some time, and it seems appropriate that it should be displayed on this momentous occasion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think our flag is good enough as it is. I do not think it needs any kind of decoration whatever when displayed at the Peace Conference on the Limitation of Armaments, or at any other conference, or in any other place in all the world. The Stars and Stripes represent American ideals of government and all that is good in society and in government. Therefore, I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution being objected to, under the rule will go over.

AMENDMENT OF COTTON FUTURES ACT.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I have noticed in last Saturday's Record a protest in the form of a resolution from the Legislature of Louisiana against an amendment which I introduced some time since to correct the cotton futures contract law. That resolution has every earmark of originating outside of the Legislature of Louisiana. However that may be, it misrepresents my proposed amendment. It states that I proposed to reduce below 10 the number of grades of cotton tenderable on contracts. That is entirely in error. My proposed amendment does not undertake to change the number of grades tenderable. Perhaps it might be better to increase the number of grades tenderable.

My amendment seeks to place the man out of the exchange on an equality with the exchange dealer. The present law gives the "bear" dealer ten chances to the other's none. This depresses the price of cotton always. The South can not prosper under this practice.

At the next session of Congress I expect to press my amendment, and we will give the Louisiana people or anybody else every opportunity to be heard. I feel a deep interest in the matter, and I hope to have legislation passed at an early date after the reconvening of this Congress for the regular session that will benefit the grower of every bale of cotton in the United States. I am ready and anxious to debate the question with any man in or out of any legislative body in this country.

TAX REVISION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am going to take but a few moments of the time of the Senate, for I am sure that a number of Senators are expecting to leave the city within a very short time and want to vote on the conference report before leaving. So I am not going to undertake to answer any of the charges which have been made or any of the criticisms which have been offered against the conference report. With many of those criticisms I agree most heartily. Others, it seems to me, are not made in good faith, indeed, as I have heard some Senators criticizing the conference report, I have wondered why, because when the bill becomes a law it will be the present revenue baby merely dressed in pink instead of red.

However, I have felt, Mr. President, that it was my duty to call the attention of the Senate to my position and to give the Senate and the country my reasons for signing the conference report. I did not hastily arrive at my conclusion to do so. I refused to sign the report until late Sunday evening, after I had made a thorough examination as to what would be the effect of the defeat of the bill, and whether or not it would be better for the business of the country to have the bill now passed or to allow the existing law to remain on the statute books and business thereby be suspended for months and months to come, as it has been during the last year.

After the conferees had agreed or disagreed to all the amendments offered by the Senate—and the conference report will show that out of 833 amendments which had been made to the bill by the Senate the Senate yielded upon but 7 amendments and that the House yielded upon 826 amendments—I took the bill as the conferees had agreed upon it and first I analyzed all of its administrative features. I took the amendments one by one and placed such amendments as I thought were an improvement over existing law upon one side and the amendments which I thought were even worse than existing law upon the other; and considering the amendments in that manner I decided that, as a whole, the administrative provisions found in the conference report were an improvement over the existing law. I believe that every Senator will agree to that statement as to the administrative features of the bill.

However, Mr. President, I wish to be perfectly frank with the Senate, and I will say that, in my opinion, there are numerous administrative provisions in the bill that never ought to have been adopted by the Senate or by the House. I am fearful that they have been put into the bill without due consideration for the hundreds and thousands of taxpayers and that only one or two or a half dozen cases which have come before the Treasury Department for adjudication have been taken into consideration. I have not any doubt that in some cases there are taxpayers who in the future will be benefited by the administrative provisions of the bill in contrast with the present law as it has been administered; but I think that while some of the administrative amendments may act in an advantageous way in five or six cases it can not be told how many cases they will affect adversely; perhaps one hundred times more than five or six cases. However, taking them as a whole, I have considered some of the administrative features of the bill better than existing law, but very little better. In fact, I almost concluded that they were hardly any better, because of the fact that the existing law, through the regulations which have been promulgated, has at least become known to a limited extent to the taxpayers.

I then considered in the same way every tax imposed, and in the same way I tried to arrive at what was best to do, what was the proper thing for me as an American citizen to do, what was the best for the taxpayer and the Government. I resolved that if I could decide without doubt that question, I would follow my conclusions; and I did not allow politics to enter into my examination in any way whatever.

Mr. President, there are some things in this bill, as far as rates are concerned, that are worse than existing law; and I want to say frankly that there are rates in the bill that are discriminatory and unjust, and I can not see how they can be defended. The American taxpayer is perfectly willing to pay taxes sufficient to maintain the Government. He is perfectly willing, if Congress is not extravagant in the appropriations and if it does not wickedly spend the people's money, to pay whatever taxes are necessary to meet all the obligations of the Government, and also pay enough to begin to reduce our obligations; but the American people are not willing to have taxes imposed that are unjust and discriminatory. The American people are not willing to have a tax imposed in one way upon one class of business and a tax imposed in another way upon identically the same kind of business; nor are the American people willing to impose taxes upon any one line of business by way of penalties, if you please, and allow other classes of business to escape taxation entirely. No tax bill will ever meet the approval of the American people until a nondiscriminatory plan is carried out, and I am sorry to say that the pending bill is not such a measure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. In this last observation perhaps my colleague is complaining about the excise taxes levied in the bill. My colleague, with his long experience and his wide knowledge of the subject, knows that some subjects and commodities and articles lend themselves appropriately to an excise tax, whereas other articles do not; and I do not think my colleague means to convey the idea that it would be unjust or inequitable to impose an excise tax upon one commodity and not impose it upon all commodities. As an illustration—and this is merely a crude one—I can readily perceive a reason for levying an excise tax upon tobacco or upon gasoline, and yet that would not justify an excise tax upon the transfer of wheat or flour or many other articles.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with my colleague; but what I had reference to was the elimination of the excise taxes in this bill and those that were continued to be taxed. Can anybody defend relieving chewing gum from a tax and having it remain on candy?

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. SMOOT. Can anyone defend relieving billiard balls from a tax and having it applied to other sporting goods on which it is imposed under this bill? It is the discriminatory tax to which I object, and it is that to which the American people object, and they are going to object to it until a tax bill is passed in which there is no discrimination.

Mr. President, after making the examination of the administrative provisions of this bill and examining the rates as found in this conference report and in existing law, I came to the conclusion that the conference report was somewhat better than existing law; but do not think I make that statement because of the fact that the surtaxes were reduced from 65 per cent to 50 per cent. That is not the reason. The 50 per cent will keep the money out of business investments and out of circulation for the purpose of extending business throughout the country just the same as the 65 per cent will.

One day a Senator asked, I think, another Senator upon this side why 32 per cent was the rate fixed by the House. Mr. President, it is a mathematical calculation. The reason is because 32 per cent is the difference between the income from a tax-exempt security and one that is taxable on the basis of to-day's money market. That is the only reason, and if Senators heard me speak upon this question on October 11 last they will remember that I called attention then to the reason why, in my opinion, it should be either one or the other, 32 per cent or 65 per cent, because, as I say, the 50 per cent will keep money out of business ventures just the same as the 65 per cent. The 50 per cent will drive the men with great fortunes into purchasing tax-exempt securities just the same as the 65 per cent will. There is no difference whatever. So, Mr. President, even with that and with the other amendments that I think are even worse than existing law, taken as a whole I think they are about equal.

That is not all, however. I wanted to get the opinion of men in whom I had confidence, not only in one section of the country but in different sections of the country, as to what effect the defeat of this bill or the passage of this bill would have upon the business of the country, lagging as it is, unsatisfactory as it is, with men out of employment all over the United States as they are. What could we do to get them back at work again? So I got into communication with leading business men of Chicago, of New York, of Boston, and also into communication with manufacturers in those different sections of the country, and I asked them to let me know, as men of affairs—not as politicians—their opinion as to whether it is best for the United States to have this bill defeated or to have it passed.

I told them that I did not want an answer at once; I wanted them to give consideration to it, and let me know later. The result was that five out of the six whom I consulted advised me that it would be better for the country, better for business, better for the industries, better for the laboring man, better for the taxpayer, to have the pending bill passed rather than to have it defeated. One reported to me that as far as he was concerned he would like to see it defeated, and by its defeat bring about a hasty revision of the revenue laws.

Mr. President, I want to say frankly as an American citizen, one interested in the welfare of all sections of the country, of business, of the laboring people, and all, and one who wants to see the conditions existing to-day changed as quickly as possible, that I, too, have come to the conclusion that if we should defeat this conference report, and leave business suspended in the air for I do not know how long, it would be indefensible, and the result of it would be most burdensome upon the people of the United States. Better a bad bill with certainty than to have uncertainty, and the institutions of the country waiting, hoping, praying for a change, unable to make any move for the future, not knowing what taxes they would have to meet, not knowing what obligations would be placed upon them, not knowing whether or not they could meet them. So, Mr. President, I concluded that it was my duty, not as a Republican, not as a Senator from the State of Utah, but as a Senator of the United States, to do all in my power to have legislation passed that would at least allow the people of the United States to know what they are to expect by way of taxation in the coming year.

Do I believe that this bill is going to be on the statute books very long? No. Do I think that it is going to be amended, and materially amended, within a very short time? I do. Senators may ask me why I think so, and I am going to be frank and say that I think so because the American people from one end of this country to the other are not satisfied with the bill. They have condemned the existing revenue law. They are justified in condemning it. I have condemned it, and at this time I want to make this prediction:

Congress, now that we are at peace, is going to scrutinize appropriations more closely than they ever have been scrutinized in the past. Appropriations are going to be cut to the bone; and I want to give notice now that unless they are I am going to vote against everything that will encourage extravagance and waste for the future. When Congress takes that position and when we live up to it, we can within the coming year revise this revenue bill and take out every discriminatory tax in it. We can eliminate all of the unjust provisions of existing law and such provisions as are contained in this conference report. We can not only do that, but we can lower the surtaxes in a way that will allow money to go into circulation, and let business revive, and let employment be the rule instead of the reverse, as existing to-day.

Mr. President, I promised not to speak more than 20 minutes, and I see that I have already spoken a little longer than that. But I desired to say to the Senate just what I have said in explanation of the vote I shall cast. I have arrived at my decision with the greatest care. If I had acted upon my first impulse, I would have voted not only against the bill but against the conference report; but for the reasons I have stated I am fearful that if I did, and that vote should defeat the report, the results which I have predicted would follow.

Therefore I think it is the duty of those who feel as I do to vote for the conference report, with the hope that this will be a temporary measure and that it will be amended at the very earliest date possible.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, let us have a vote on the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

PRINTING OF REVENUE ACT OF 1921.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 177) was read as follows:

Resolved. That 14,000 additional copies of the pamphlet law of the revenue act of 1921 be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that the copies can be printed within the amount allowed by a former Senate resolution.

Mr. KING. That presumes that the President will sign the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course it will not be the law if he does not sign it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

FAMINE CONDITIONS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document a report of the American Commission on Near East Relief, comprising 64 typewritten pages, which contain very valuable information as to famine conditions in Russia. I am sure that Members of the Congress would very greatly desire to have the information.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, inasmuch as we are to adjourn to-day I shall have to ask that the request be referred to the Committee on Printing, and therefore I shall have to object to the request of the Senator from Maryland.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

NOMINATIONS FOR POSTMASTERS, ETC.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, some further nominations for postmasters and other nominations have just come from the President. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business as in open executive session for the purpose only of referring those nominations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me ask the Senator from Kansas what is the purpose of submitting these nominations if they must be referred and the nominations lapse, remaining unconfirmed?

Mr. CURTIS. Most of the nominations are for the office of postmaster, and I understand that if we refer them immediately the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads will report them back.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will that hold true as to other nominations?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; I understand so.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have no objection.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I feel obliged to object to the confirmation of the appointment of postmasters which have been made to-day and yesterday. The system has been adopted of naming postmasters on a civil-service basis, which I approve of, and if we confirm on the day the nominations are made there will be no means for a Senator to ascertain and know whether or not the civil-service rules have been complied with.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I withdraw the request.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The only proper way is to have the nominations made public, let them remain in the committee a few days, and let us have information from the proper source as to whether the civil-service rules have been complied with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me just a moment, I will say this: The Senator states that he objects to action upon nominations made yesterday or to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I object to the confirmation of nominations made yesterday or to-day. I think they should go over until the next session.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Those which were made yesterday and this morning have all been referred and acted upon in the usual way, so there can not be any objection to those. There may be objection to the last nominations, which we have not yet had before the committee for consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have no objection to the individuals. What I want to know is whether the civil-service rules have been complied with, and I can not tell that by simply having a nominee's name presented to me. There is no way, then, to ascertain whether he has been appointed under the civil-service rules or not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I suggest to the Senator that there will be no postmasters confirmed, in Massachusetts or any other State, who do not have the approval of the Senator from the State? We have obtained that approval in very many of these cases. The last batch of nominations which has just been presented, of course, has not yet been handed to our committee. I do not think the Senator's objection can possibly apply to the nominations which have already been approved by the Senators from the different States.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand that the Senator from Kansas proposes to submit some nominations to be referred to the committee, which nominations have just been made by the President—

Mr. CURTIS. I have withdrawn that request.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And at another session later in the day to have those nominations confirmed. I am not protesting against the nominations to offices in Massachusetts. So far as I know they are satisfactory; but I wish to see that the nominations of postmasters are made in compliance with the rules and regulations made by the authorities. The only way I can determine whether that has been done is by having the nominations referred to the committee, having publicity given to the nominations, and then have the confirmation follow after we find out whether the civil-service rules have been complied with.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Was there not a unanimous-consent agreement that immediately upon completion of the revenue bill the Senate should proceed to the consideration of executive business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was.

Mr. CURTIS. That is true, and I was about to make that motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 50 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

INVESTIGATION OF TREATMENT OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. CALDER. I report back favorably from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, Senate resolution 165, which was recommitted to that committee on the 22d instant, together with the amendment proposed on that day by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution with the amendment reported by the committee.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 9, before the words "the expenses," to insert "and to employ such clerical assistance as in the judgment of the committee may be necessary," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved. That the special committee appointed by the Chair, pursuant to the resolution adopted November 4, to investigate the charges made by the junior Senator from Georgia, is hereby authorized, until it finishes said investigation and reports, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1.25 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with the subject pending before said committee, and to employ such clerical assistance as in the judgment of the committee may be necessary, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon authorization of the chairman, and that the committee or any subcommittee thereof may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate at any place.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

REPRINT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, ANNOTATED.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate resolution 151, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved. That the Constitution of the United States of America, including all amendments thereto and with citations of the cases of the Supreme Court of the United States construing its several provisions, collated under each separate provision, to date, be printed, and that 1,500 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate. The Judiciary Committee is authorized to employ a competent person to prepare the citations provided for, his compensation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Minnesota desires to say a word in regard to the resolution.

Mr. NELSON. The resolution just reported was offered by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. Down to 1910 or 1911—I am not quite sure of the year—the decisions of the Supreme Court were noted at the foot of every constitutional amendment in our legislative manual. If Senators will refer to the old manuals, they will find that the decisions bearing on each particular paragraph of the Constitution were noted at the end of the paragraph. The object of this resolution is simply to bring the citations down to date. The annotations were made down to 1911. I do not think it would involve much expense.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that a great deal of that work was practically useless on account of the way in which it was done. As a lawyer I am sure the Senator has had the same experience I have had. The copy of the Constitution which is printed for the use of the Senate contains those annotations. After the various clauses of the Constitution is a list of the decisions of the Supreme Court, sometimes a page or more of citations.

In that maze of citations there is not a gleam of light as to what particular question under the section or clause of the Constitution was decided by the case which is cited. In order to make them of very much use the annotator ought to cite in brief language the point decided by the court in the case which he cites.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRISON in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. May I state that I am having the Committee on Rules prepare a manual for the next Congress, and for that manual I am having one of the clerks of the committee prepare citations to all of the decisions of the Supreme Court on all of the clauses of the Constitution which have been passed upon?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There ought to be an instruction given to the clerk that instead of a mere jumble of citations he should follow some such suggestion as I have just made. The Senator from Kansas realizes the fact that hundreds of questions arise under a particular section, even a particular clause, of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CURTIS. I have made that statement merely to let the Senate know that that work is being done by my committee. I do not know why the resolution was offered. Of course, if the Committee on the Judiciary is going to do the work, I shall stop the work by my committee, because there is no use of two committees doing the same work.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not know that there was any duplication of work, and, of course, there ought not to be.

Mr. CURTIS. I would be very glad to have my committee cease the work, because it is a pretty difficult undertaking.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Whichever committee does it, really, I think, there ought to be some serious attention given to the manner in which it is done, so as to make it of some real use after it is done.

Mr. NELSON. In the absence of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar], who introduced the resolution, all I can say at present is that personally it is quite satisfactory to me if the work shall be done by the Committee on Rules. If it is left to the Committee on the Judiciary, we would probably have the clerks of the committee do a good deal of work without any special charge to the Senate. But if the Committee on Rules desires to carry on the work instead of the Committee on the Judiciary, personally I have no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. The Committee on Rules is doing it for this reason: A number of years ago the Committee on Rules prepared a manual and cited the various authorities. A few days ago the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Brandegee] called my attention to the fact that in the last manual these decisions were not cited and asked me if I would not have the clerks of the committee prepare a new manual for the next Congress, and in that new edition cite the authorities. I at once set one of my clerks at work going over the authorities, seeing that they were correct and preparing the work to make a report as soon as we can get it up or when the next manual is presented. I would very much rather have the Committee on the Judiciary do it, because I believe it is better equipped to do it than is the Committee on Rules. I am simply having the work performed, because I was requested by the Senator from Connecticut and because of the further fact that it was done once before by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. NELSON. Inasmuch as the work done before was by the Committee on Rules and it has already engaged in the work, I would suggest that the consideration of the resolution be postponed. Let it go over until the next session.

Mr. McKellar. Mr. President, I was called from the Chamber for a moment and did not hear the full discussion on this matter. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas if it is proposed to arrange the work just as it has been done previously? Would it not be very much better for the convenience of Senators if some note of the subject matter were given before or after the citation of each opinion? I think it would save a great deal of extra labor on the part of Senators in looking up cases if some such arrangement could be made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

Mr. McKellar. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I made the request to the Senator from Kansas at the suggestion of one of the officials of the Senate, I have forgotten whom, who noticed that all the citations of decisions by the Supreme Court involving the construction of any clause of the Constitution had been omitted from our present edition of the manual. I had not noticed it before. I think it would be a great convenience to have them restored. I agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. Poindexter] that really, when we get 100 Supreme Court citations at the foot of one clause of the Constitution, as contained in our manual, without anything to show what particular question was before the court under that clause of the Constitution, it is not much of a labor-saving device, but we have to look through the whole of them to find perhaps the one point which we are seeking.

Therefore, it seems to me that perhaps it would not be wise to rush to a decision this afternoon. With this object in view at the next session, it occurred to me that it would be a good thing to do what the Senator from Washington has suggested and what the pending resolution calls for, at least to a certain extent—that is, to have the Constitution printed to the extent of 1,000 copies for the use of Senators, with the citations brought down to date under each clause, and with a sort of little syllabus under each decision cited to show the point involved. Let us have that done merely for the use of Senators. Then we need not have all those citations printed in the manual. We can retain the manual as it is, but have the extra book in the shape of a pamphlet which could be consulted by Senators.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest that the resolution go to the calendar, and we can decide the question at the opening of the next session.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, before that action is had, I wish to make a suggestion in conformity with what the Senator from Connecticut has said. I have a good many requests, and no doubt other Senators have, for copies of the Constitution. If there is anything in the world that we ought to put within the reach of the people, it is the Constitution of the United States. I think there ought to be an edition gotten out by some committee, I do not care which one, that will enable us to bring copies of the Constitution within the reach of all our people.

Mr. McKellar. There ought really to be a larger number printed than is contemplated in this resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The 1,000 there contemplated are simply for the use of the Senate and to be kept here. I have once or twice in the past had the Constitution of the United States printed as a public document and it has been distributed.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the Senator will do it again.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It can always be done on a motion of any Senator.

Mr. McKellar. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Connecticut is a very wise one, that it should give a notation of the various decisions.

Mr. CALDER. I have no objection to the resolution going over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

ADDITIONAL CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate resolution 157, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to employ an assistant clerk at the rate of $2,200 per annum, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire whether the committee has not already a sufficient number of clerks?

Mr. CURTIS. The committee now has the same number of clerks that other committees have. I did not ask for this additional clerk while I was chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs because I was very familiar with the work and had it systematized, and by having my clerks render extra service I was able to carry on all the work of the committee. But a new chairman must be appointed, and I am told by officials of the Senate that so far as the receipt of mail is concerned that committee ranks with the five highest. I know from my work on the committee that the new chairman will have difficulty in performing the work of the committee unless he has extra help.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many additional clerks are asked for?

Mr. CURTIS. Only one.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is this a permanent clerk or for the session?

Mr. CURTIS. The resolution provides for a clerk permanently or until otherwise provided by law. I think the resolution should be amended to provide the clerk merely during the session of Congress.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think it should be provided for the next session only.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether or not in addition to the clerks the chairman already has he would have any additional clerks?

Mr. CURTIS. One additional clerk is all that is asked.

Mr. KING. Then the resolution should be amended so as to provide the clerk just for the session.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the additional clerk had better be provided just for the next session.

Mr. CALDER. I move to amend the resolution by providing that the additional clerk shall be authorized merely for the next regular session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In line 5 it is proposed to strike out the words "until otherwise provided by law" and to insert the words "for the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to employ an assistant clerk at the rate of $2,200 per annum, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, for the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS PAMUNKEY RIVER, VA.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 2710) granting the consent of Congress to the Pamunkey Ferry Co. to construct a bridge across the Pamunkey River, in Virginia, and I submit a report (No. 324) thereon.

This is a bill which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is very anxious to have passed, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Pamunkey Ferry Co., duly incorporated under the laws of Virginia, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Pamunkey River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near Sweet Hall, in King William County, to a point opposite in New Kent County, in the Commonwealth of Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESOLUTION OF AMERICAN LEGION.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a five-line resolution by the American Legion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Tennessee will be granted.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolution No. 14, adopted by the American Legion in convention at Kansas City, November 2, 1921.

Be it resolved by the American Legion, That we urge the enactment of an amendment to the act of June 4, 1920, that will place former emergency officers who were appointed to the Regular Army under this act on a parity in all respects with other officers of the Regular Army, of equal age and attainments, as to rank, pay, promotions, and retirement privileges.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. S. 1039. An act for the promotion of the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy, and for other purposes;

S. 2555. An act to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Great Pee Dee River, S. C.;

S. 2722. An act to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the White River at or near the town of Des Arc, Ark.;

S. 2724. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the White River, in Prairie County, Ark.; and

S. J. Res. 33. Joint resolution permitting certain Chinese to register under certain provisions and conditions.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. CURTIS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 178), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join a similar committee appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses, having completed the business of the present session, are ready to adjourn, unless the President has some other communication to make to them.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. CURTIS and Mr. HITCHCOCK as the committee on the part of the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on to-day the President approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 2594. An act authorizing the counties of Allendale, S. C., and Screven, Ga., to construct a bridge across the Savannah River, between said counties, at or near Burtons Ferry;

S. 2722. An act to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the White River at or near the town of Des Arc, Ark.;

S. 2724. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the White River, in Prairie County, Ark.; and

S. J. Res. 33. Joint resolution permitting certain Chinese to register under certain provisions and conditions.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, your committee who were appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses of Congress, having completed the business of the present session, are now ready to adjourn unless he has some further communication to make, beg leave to report that they have performed the duty assigned them and that the President replied he had no further communication to make to the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive the report of the committee, and the committee is discharged.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday, November 16, 1921, was read and approved.

INVESTIGATION OF DYE LOBBY.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 314, Senate resolution 77, which was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, was then referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and subsequently reported back by that committee. It is the dye-investigation resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 77, the dye-investigation resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let it be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Committee on the Judiciary proposed an amendment to strike out the preamble, resolving clause, and the body of the resolution and to substitute a new preamble, resolving clause, and resolution. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate report it back with an amendment to strike out the last clause of the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We would like to have the resolution read. That does not tell us anything about what it is.

Mr. KING. Let the resolution be read as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As reported by the Committee on the Judiciary the resolution reads as follows:

Whereas it has been charged that the dye industry is controlled by a combination of corporations and that it is in fact a monopoly, and that in order to maintain such monopoly and obtain an embargo against the importation of competing dyes, has employed agents, attorneys, and lobbyists to influence Congress in behalf of special legislation in the interest of such dye monopoly: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and instructed to investigate the charge that the dye industry is controlled by a combination of corporations which is in fact a monopoly and has employed agents, attorneys, and lobbyists to influence Congress in behalf of special legislation in the interest of such monopoly and report its findings to the Senate, together with such recommendations as it may deem appropriate.

Resolved further, That the committee is authorized to subpoena witnesses, send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ the necessary clerical assistance in the prosecution of such investigation.

The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate proposes to strike from the resolution the second resolve.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I would like to have read, then, the resolve which the Committee to Audit and Control proposes to strike out.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Resolved further, That the committee is authorized to subpoena witnesses, send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ the necessary clerical assistance in the prosecution of such investigation.

Mr. CALDER. The committee struck out the last resolve because the authority to subpoena witnesses, to send for books and papers, and all the other things provided in the second resolve, is already vested in the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KING. If that be true, what objection can there be to making assurance double sure by passing the resolution as it came from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. CALDER. There is no objection to that being done if the provision in the second resolve, permitting the committee to hire clerical assistance, shall be stricken out.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think it is at all necessary for the committee to go into a long and extensive investigation. The great trouble is that we do not read the reports of the investigations that have been conducted. If the Members of the Senate would read all of the testimony extant to-day on this subject taken by the Committee on Ways and Means of the House and the Committee on Finance of the Senate, I think they would find all that they could obtain by further investigation along the same line. All Senators have got to do is to read the testimony and make up their minds whether or not there has been such a propaganda as is supposed to influence Senators, and also as to whether or not the dye industry is a monopoly. The evidence is already taken; it is at hand.

Mr. MOSES. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that there is a vast amount of evidence on this subject that has never been presented to any committee. I myself happen to have some that has never been presented to any committee. I happen to have some evidence about the activities of this group in my State which never has been presented to any committee or to the Senate or to anybody else. I should prefer that such evidence as I have should be submitted in a proper and orderly manner before a duly constituted investigating committee of the Senate; but if the Senator from North Dakota prefers to have a series of explosive presentations on the floor, that course may be followed I suppose.

Mr. KING. I sincerely hope the Senator from North Dakota is not going to object to the consideration of this measure or to oppose its passage. I can state to the Senator—

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say to the Senator that if we want to go into another investigation along this line, I have not the slightest objection, but I know there are literally hundreds and hundreds of pages of testimony which have been taken upon the same subject which most of the Senators, at least, have never read.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that I think he is in error. There are not hundreds and hundreds of pages, but there are, perhaps, 50 or 75 pages bearing directly upon the matter covered by the resolution appearing in the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Committee on Finance of the Senate, but—

Mr. McCUMBER. There are many more than that in the Committee on Finance of the Senate.

Mr. KING. But I can assure the Senator that his committee did not even skim the surface of the subject. Witnesses sent by the dye monopoly, including paid attorneys, testified in favor of an embargo, but no probe was made of the monopoly, the methods by which it operates, the organizations composing it, the sums of money expended in its behalf to secure legislation and to control public opinion and deceive the electorate of the United States.

I can assure the Senator that his committee did not make an investigation. They listened to paid lobbyist and attorneys who made specious pleas for legislation which would enable the dye interests to rob the American people. There should be an investigation that will investigate, that will get all the facts relating to this monopoly, its activities, its sinister purposes, its reprehensible if not corrupt methods of operation, its persistent efforts to control Congress and secure legislation that will enable it to destroy all competition and put millions of profits annually into the pockets of a favored few.

But I am anxious to get a vote and will not make further reply to the Senator from North Dakota. Let me add that in my opinion no Senator who desires the facts and full information upon a monopoly that has become an evil will oppose this resolution or any honest effort to investigate the dye monopoly.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me, as I heard the resolution read, that the particular clause which the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate attempts to strike out by its amendment ought to be amended, and before the motion to strike out is voted on I think would be the proper time to perfect the resolution. I may be mistaken, but, as I remember, the main resolution authorized the Judiciary Committee or any subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, and so forth. The other clause merely authorized the Judiciary Committee to subpoena witnesses, and so forth. The resolution ought to read "or any subcommittee," it seems to me. The question of the authority of a subcommittee, if one were appointed, might arise when they should undertake to go ahead.

Mr. KING. May the amendment offered by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be read? I refer to the provision which it seeks to eliminate. The resolution, I think, as it was reported by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the chairman of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, is sufficiently broad and comprehensive.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us have the resolution read and see about that. I may be mistaken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate proposes to amend the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary by striking out the following words:

Resolved further, That the committee is authorized to subpoena witnesses, send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ the necessary clerical assistance in the prosecution of such investigation.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I think his point would be covered if after the word "committee" there would be inserted the words "or any subcommittee."

Mr. NORRIS. I very much doubt that.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator being adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. The main resolution provides that the investigation shall be made by the Judiciary Committee or "any subcommittee thereof." In the second resolving clause there should be inserted, after the words "the committee," the words "or such subcommittee."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I remember, by general resolution the Judiciary Committee or any subcommittee of that committee has the power to send for persons and papers and to swear witnesses. The only respect, as I hastily reflect upon it now, in which the amendment proposed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate changes the resolution as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary is this: I do not think that the Judiciary Committee would have any power to employ assistance and counsel and other help of that kind. So, if the resolution is passed as it now is, the subcommittee will have authority to investigate, or may have by order of the full committee, and will have power to send for persons and papers and to subpoena witnesses, but the work will have to be done by the members of the Judiciary Committee who are thus appointed instead of employing anyone else to do it for them.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the committee will be permitted to employ a stenographer, because that authority was vested in the committee by the resolution which was passed at the beginning of the session.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I mean is that I suppose we should have no authority to employ counsel or to employ experts or to employ assistance.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Iowa is correct.

The second resolve was stricken out because the committee felt that the Judiciary Committee already had authority, either by the full committee or by the subcommittee; and the committee believed that if the committee charged with this investigation should wish clerical help or other help to assist, it could at some time hereafter come to the Senate and ask for it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not contesting the proposition made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The only object I have in suggesting the amendment is to make an investigation effective if one is to take place, so that there may be no occasion for the committee to come back here and ask for further authority. I want to enlarge their authority. The resolution, as I understood it, provides, in substance, that the Committee on the Judiciary or any subcommittee thereof shall have power to conduct the investigation.

Mr. CUMMINS. No. The original resolution required the appointment of a special committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I am speaking of the resolution as reported from the Judiciary Committee by the Senator from Iowa.

There is a second resolve which the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate reports to strike out which I want to perfect by an amendment before we vote on it. That second resolve provides what the committee may do. I think it ought to provide that it may also be done by the subcommittee. I wish the Senator from Connecticut would read it for me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The second resolution to which the Senator refers reads as follows—this is one that the committee omitted—

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator read the first resolution first, because they are related to each other?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; the first resolution is:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and instructed to investigate the charge that the dye industry is controlled by a combination of corporations which is in fact a monopoly and has employed agents, attorneys, and lobbyists to influence Congress in behalf of special legislation in the interest of such monopoly and report its findings to the Senate, together with such recommendations as it may deem appropriate.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I will ask the Senator to read the other resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The part which the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate suggest to be stricken out is as follows:

Resolved further, That the committee is authorized to subpoena witnesses, send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ the necessary clerical assistance in the prosecution of such investigation.

The Secretary, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska, has interlined, after the word "committee," the words "or such subcommittee."

Mr. NORRIS. That is all I want. I think it will perfect it if those words are there. I think anybody can see in a moment that if we are going to adopt the resolution at all it ought to empower the subcommittee to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I myself do not think the investigation will amount to anything. I do not believe that it is the business of Congress to decide what is a monopoly and what is not. That is a judicial question for the courts to decide. So it would amount to nothing if we resolved that, in our opinion, the dye industry was a monopoly. Nevertheless, if the Senate is determined to enter upon this field, I would suggest that if the second resolve, authorizing the committee or subcommittee to subpoena witnesses and to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and employ the necessary clerical assistance, is to be adopted, we had better say "the necessary clerical and other assistance," because, as the Senator from Iowa has stated, they may have to employ experts to examine the books of the company and also to employ counsel; at any rate, if we want a complete investigation we had better completely equip the investigating committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is whether there is objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not want to object to the immediate consideration of the resolution, but I do want to confirm what the Senator from Connecticut has said, that the proposed investigation will not amount to anything. It will be just like all other investigations. We will be investigating some things that are contained in the record to-day; we would be subpoenaing witnesses to ascertain whether the dye industry has employed attorneys to influence Members of Congress. Attorneys have been employed; attorneys have appeared before the committees; they appeared for the purpose of influencing the committees in favor of dye legislation. Not only that, but statements appear in the record showing what is paid to these attorneys for their services. Before both the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House we are having hearings all the time, and in a great many cases paid attorneys appear before the committees for the purpose of presenting their clients' cases. There is no question about that. We do not need to investigate that again. As I have already stated there is testimony before the committees to which I have referred showing conclusively that attorneys have been employed for the purpose of securing an embargo, for instance.

The question whether the dye industry is a monopoly may be a serious one. In some branches of the dye industry there may be a monopoly, while in other branches there may not be a monopoly. There may be a manufacturer who produces only one certain brand or character of dyes, and, of course, that would be a monopoly because there is no one else who produces the same article. All of that appears already in the hearings, and I can not believe that any further investigation, no matter how many answers may be forthcoming, will bring forth a single fact that is not already in the testimony.

It may be that somebody has tried to influence voters in New Hampshire and that is not in the testimony. If there should be an investigation along that line, I certainly should not object, but I know what these investigations mean. They consume time; it is easier often hearing testimony than it is doing the regular work of the Senate or of the House; and after the reports are submitted they mold quietly in the committee room or elsewhere and nothing is done concerning them.

I shall not object to a vote upon this resolution and investigating the matter, but I predict now that the investigation will have exactly the same result that has followed nearly all other investigations.

Mr. MOSES. I assure the Senator that many things will be brought out in this investigation that do not appear in any record yet made.

Mr. McCUMBER. The things that are charged and which it is asked to investigate under the resolution appear in the testimony taken before the two committees now, and are in print before both branches of Congress.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity of examining this resolution; but I should like to ask the Senator from Utah whether it is broad enough to give the committee power to investigate the practices of importers of dyes as well, and as to whether they have exerted any influence whatsoever, and are controlling the market or trade. I think that is very important, and I think it should be included in the resolution. I do not think the dye industry or the chemical industry fear any investigation of this character; but I think if the Senator will extend the scope of the investigation to investigate the practices of the importers and the influence they have exerted, he may reveal something.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think an investigation of the activities of the dye lobby, of its effort to secure legislation, of the operation of the dye monopoly, and its efforts to prevent importations of dyes, and to control the State Department or the agency therein which grants licenses to import dyes, will reveal something of which the Senator from New Jersey may not be aware. The resolution before us has been emasculated,

It asked for an investigation of various lobbies and their efforts to secure legislation or to prevent legislation. It calls attention to the many lobbies which seek to control or influence Congress, and provides for their investigation. The Judiciary Committee amended the resolution and limited the investigation to the dye lobby and dye monopoly. I regret the amendment, but must be content for the present. However, I demand the passage of the resolution as reported back to the Senate by the Judiciary Committee. I ask for a vote.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first inquiry is whether there is objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I shall object unless the Senator agrees to amend his resolution in the regard I have indicated.

Mr. KING. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution. It has been on the calendar for some time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 77, creating a special committee to investigate the expenditures made in behalf of various propaganda and in the maintenance of lobbies in Washington.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegge	Hale	McKinley	Sutherland
Broussard	Harrison	McNary	Townsend
Bursum	Heflin	Moses	Trammell

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn sine die.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being sine die under the concurrent resolution of the two Houses.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, November 23, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. WALSH].

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for the greatness of Thy love, for the pity of Thy heart, and for the strength of Thy grace; therefore we would enter Thy gates with praise and Thy courts with thanksgiving and acknowledge Thee to be our God and our everlasting Father. The might of Thy hand has upheld the walls of the world, and the heavens and the earth record the presence of Thy mercy.

We bless Thy holy name for the stability and the security of our Republic. From our earliest years to our latest breath Thou hast led us forth into a large inheritance. For abundant harvests and fruits of field and land we praise Thee; for the great, broad blessings which have come to all our people we thank Thee. Oh, continue to bestow happiness, comfort, and good will upon all our citizens. Strengthen the bonds of the divinest love in all our homes; behold our children and breathe the messages of gladness and goodness into their hearts; comfort the poor who are bowed down with weakness; care for the sick and bring back their sunny hope and make everybody glad with the purest joy. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. QUIN. I rise to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the Record the very able speech made by my colleague [Mr. Tyson, of Alabama] on the 11th day of November, Armistice Day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting in the RECORD a speech made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Tyson] upon November 11. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the remarks of my colleague [Mr. GRIEST] on the subject of agriculture.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to insert a speech made by his colleague [Mr. GRIEST] on the subject of agriculture. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DISCONTINUANCE OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD for the information of Members, in large type, the views of the minority on Senate joint resolution 132 as amended by the House Printing Committee, which is in reference to a continuance of the printing of certain public documents.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD in large type the views of the minority on Senate joint resolution 132 relative to continuing certain Government publications. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Senate joint resolution 132, passed by the Senate a few days ago, undertook to give the Joint Committee on Printing full authority to handle the situation which has arisen in connection with the multitude of Government magazines and newspapers. The House Committee on Printing, which consists of but three members, amended the Senate resolution so as to further extend the time. To that proposal I dissented and have filed the following (Report No. 485):

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

In the opinion of the undersigned, little or nothing, either in the way of economy or in the settlement of the publication problem, will be accomplished by a further extension of time in which unauthorized magazines, periodicals, and other publications may be continued to be issued, wholly or in part, at Government expense.

Many Congresses have tried to find a method of ending the multitude of Government publications which have started as official bulletins and developed into magazines or newspapers.

Congress has continued its effort. Legislation was passed which gave the Joint Committee on Printing certain authority but which limited the publication of the bulk of these Government magazines and newspapers "until the close of the next regular session of Congress," which was the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, which expired June 5, 1920.

In other words, in the absence of legislation by Congress the publications were to cease to exist. Some publications were ended through cooperation of the departments and the Joint Committee on Printing, but there was no legislation.

A serious effort to end the irregularity was made by adding an antiprinting rider to an appropriation bill, which was vetoed by President Wilson on the ground that it interfered with the rights of the departments.

FIRST EXTENSION OF TIME.

So an extension of time was secured in section 4 of Public act No. 246, Sixty-sixth Congress, approved June 6, 1920, which provided that—

Any journal, magazine, periodical, or similar publication which is now being issued by a department or establishment of the Government may, in the discretion of the head thereof, be continued, within the limitation of available appropriations or other Government funds, until June 30, 1921, when, if it shall not have been specifically authorized by Congress before that date, such journal, magazine, periodical, or similar publication shall be discontinued.

SECOND EXTENSION OF TIME.

When that date was about to be reached it was once more discovered that no action had been taken looking to the regulation of Government publications and the date was again extended by legislation, section 3 of Public act No. 389, Sixty-sixth Congress, approved March 4, 1921, as follows:

Any journal, magazine, periodical, or similar publication which is now being issued by a department or establishment of the Government may, in the discretion of the head thereof, be continued, within the limitation of available appropriations or other Government funds, until December 1, 1921, when, if it shall not have been specifically authorized by Congress before that date, such journal, magazine, periodical, or similar publication shall be discontinued.

Why grant another extension?

In my opinion, to grant by special act of Congress another extension until March 1, 1922, is to again invite inaction. It will leave the publications once more up in the air. It will call for still another extension.

A MILLION A YEAR SAVED.

Pursuant to the act of March 1, 1919, the Joint Committee on Printing undertook a careful investigation of all Government periodicals and submitted a report on April 12, 1920. This report showed that 266 journals, magazines, and periodicals were being published by various branches of the Government, at a cost of approximately $2,500,000 per annum.

As a result, either of the regulations adopted by the committee or the acts of the departments themselves, after many conferences with the committee, 111 of these publications, costing approximately $1,200,000 per annum, were discontinued.

This left 155 publications, the continuance of which was authorized by the committee until the end of the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

Since then, by agreement, 50 or 75 Government newspapers or magazines have been discontinued.

Some of these have switched back to official Government bulletins. Others have let go of the Government "teat" and are now being printed privately. Others hang on and insist that they are being printed within the law.

The Joint Committee on Printing has on file applications for the continuance of 41 publications. There are 40 more, probably, which need attention. The list of Government periodicals in existence on February 14, 1921, comprises 36 pages, each page the size of a page of this report.

There were on June 30 last a total of 342 Government printing plants in the United States and dependencies, with an appraised value of $1,026,000, not including the Government Printing Office in Washington.

There is objection to Senate joint resolution No. 132, for the reason that it places power in the Joint Committee on Printing which should be left to Congress, but the plan provided for in the Senate resolution is, in my opinion, preferable to the proposal in the substitute that the time be again extended.

NO WORTHY PUBLICATION WILL LOSE.

In my opinion no worthy publication will lose by its temporary suspension, which need not be for more than 30 days. On a proper showing it can be resumed by act of Congress, so that it will no longer have a doubtful status. Many publications which have grown up around statistical tables are unnecessary. The tables and other proper information can be published under section 89 of the act approved January 12, 1895, by which departments print—administrative reports, statistical publications, rules, regulations, instructions, opinions, decisions, official notices and circulars, office records, and such matter as may be required for the exclusive official use of the issuing office or service in the transaction of its routine business.

But bureau chiefs must learn that to issue Government reports and bulletins is one thing, and to issue magazines and newspapers with editorials, book reviews, and illustrations is another.

ENDLESS-CHAIN PROPOSITION.

For 10 years the printing of Government publications has run wild. At the end of the World War the number of propaganda and specialty publications going out at the expense of the Government amounted to a scandal. The half-Government-half-private publications were unfair to the Government.

Many Government publications pay much attention to the promotion and development of the particular bureaus from which they come. They boost the bureau, the bureau boosts the magazine, and thus a power for dragging down appropriations and starting "official" back-fires against opposition in Congress is quickly developed.

Even now back-fires are raging; started by Government officials, the telegrams paid for with Government money—all designed to keep all of these publications going that they may assist in getting more money from the Government—"as if increase of appetite had grown by what it fed on."

A little iron now and the desire of this Congress and previous Congresses to end this troublesome system can be realized. A bill giving specific authority to certain publications, and prescribing their size and how far they shall go as newspapers, periodicals, or magazines can be prepared, discussed, and quickly passed. But to decide that for fear that some favored one shall die none shall die means simply to continue the waste.

ALBERT JOHNSON.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the War Finance Corporation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 15.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the two Houses of Congress shall adjourn on Wednesday, the 23d day of November, 1921, and that when they adjourn on said day they stand adjourned sine die.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On November 23, 1921:

H. J. Res. 225. Joint resolution authorizing payment of the salaries of officers and employees of Congress for November, 1921, on the 23d day of said month;

H. R. 7051. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to execute deeds of reconveyance for certain lands in the city of Mount Pleasant, Isabella County, Mich.; and

H. R. 7294. An act, supplemental to the national prohibition act.

RECESS.

Mr. WEAVER. Will the gentleman withhold that request for a moment?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record, as I wish to insert a speech delivered by my colleague, Hon. S. M. BRINSON, before the North Carolina Society a few days ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by inserting a speech delivered by his colleague [Mr. BRINSON]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. RHODES. To prefer a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by printing an address I delivered at St. Louis September 3 last, before the International First Aid Mine Rescue Society meeting. The address is of a historical and scientific character.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by inserting therein an address delivered by him last September before the International First Aid Mine Rescue Society. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

RECESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 2 o'clock this afternoon. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are two bills of great importance, especially to the agricultural interests of the country, on which the Senate and House Committees on Banking and Currency are unanimous. One of them would put a State bank or State banks in agricultural States in the same position as national banks with reference to the volume of rediscounts by any particular individual borrower at a Federal reserve bank. The other is a bill which will permit an extension until October 31, 1922, of a provision of the law which expired on the 31st of October, which would permit banks to exceed the limit of loans to an individual where that loan was secured by Liberty bonds, and the borrower was the original subscriber and holder of those himself, having bought them at par before January 1, 1921. Now, those two bills—

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Let me ask if either of those two bills has passed the Senate?

Mr. WINGO. My recollection is that both of them have. I know one of them has, and I was told in committee that both have. I have not been able this morning to get hold of both of the Senate bills, but I am sure one of them, S. 831, has passed the Senate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman from Arkansas think it fair to bring up the question of consideration of those bills just at this time?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is not fair to me. I have been demanding consideration of these bills for three weeks, as the Record will show. The House Committee on Banking and Currency by unanimous vote directed the chairman to get a rule and do all things necessary to pass both of these bills, and inasmuch as the law expired on October 31 on one of them, that bill should have been passed before that date. Nothing but inefficiency and neglect and incompetency is responsible for it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now that the gentleman has delivered himself of that, against whom does he make the charge?

Mr. WINGO. Against the responsible leaders of this House, the leaders of the Republican Party here, who have charge of the legislation in this House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now is he satisfied?

Mr. WINGO. No. I will say to him that he will not do any business to-day without a quorum until he either passes these bills or those in authority on the Republican side give assurance they will be passed. Now does the gentleman understand?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Let him object. We have had enough of political grandstanding, and now let us do a little public business.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman's remarks are unworthy of him, and he would not use them elsewhere.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is only a threat.

Mr. WINGO. No; it is not a threat; but the gentleman's remark displays neither character nor courage. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-four gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not qualify.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7102. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] will please assume the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7102) to fix standards for hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7102, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7102) to fix standards for hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] is recognized.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. What is the status of time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas has 40 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] has 5 minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the time allotted to me I shall not address myself to the bill under consideration. I have asked for time in order to correct certain misstatements made day before yesterday on the floor of this House by gentlemen who spoke in opposition to the motion to recommit the tax bill with instructions to concur in Senate amendment 582, increasing the estates tax rates by four new brackets.

For a number of years I have given considerable study to estate and inheritance taxes. I think I know what was involved in the Senate amendment. I am not taking the floor for the purpose of finding fault with the attitude of those who differ with me on the question of levying higher estate taxes, but rather for the purpose of preserving the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as an encyclopedia of accurate information.

A MEMBER. You have some job.

Mr. WOODRUFF. You had better get more time.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] made two statements that I tried to correct at the time, but the gentleman's time being limited, I could not secure the floor to correct the statements made by him. Other statements which I consider incorrect were made by other gentlemen, but they have not yet been printed in the RECORD. I am, therefore, directing my attention to the statements of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], not because of any desire on my part to single him out especially, but because his remarks have been printed in the RECORD, while the remarks of the other gentlemen have been withheld, and I hope will be corrected before they are printed in the RECORD.

I call your attention to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 21 to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] on page 8081. You will find this statement: "He (that is, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]) wants you to vote to double the present inheritance tax." What are the facts? The present Federal estate tax, commonly referred to as the "inheritance tax," begins with a 1 per cent rate on net estates over $50,000, and the rates are graduated upward until we reach 25 per cent on net estates over $10,000,000. Senate amendment No. 582 did not change a single rate up to $10,000,000. That amendment simply limited the operation of the 25 per cent rate on net estates between $10,000,000 and $15,000,000 and then added four new brackets to apply on net estates over $15,000,000 as follows: Thirty per cent on net estates between $15,000,000 and $25,000,000; 35 per cent on net estates between $25,000,000 and $50,000,000; 40 per cent on net estates between $50,000,000 and $100,000,000; and 50 per cent on net estates over $100,000,000. That in no sense doubles the present inheritance tax. It doubles the rate only on net estates over $100,000,000. So much for that statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Before I proceed to refer to another incorrect statement, permit me to divert for an observation in regard to the 50 per cent rate on estates over $100,000,000. For all practical purposes, judging from our past experience, the rate on estates over $100,000,000 might as well be 100 per cent or 1 per cent. From the date when the present estates tax law was enacted in 1916 to this time no net estate amounting to $100,000,000 or more has gone through the Treasury Department. Up until July 1 of this year the Treasury Department kept no record of the number and size of estates. Since the 1st of July this year that department is keeping such a record. The Treasury Department, however, has a record of the 15 largest net estates that have gone through that department since the Federal estates tax law was enacted in 1916. That record shows no net estate over $100,000,000; three net estates between $50,000,000 and $100,000,000 as follows, to wit: Eighty-nine million dollars, $79,000,000, and $53,000,000; and the remaining 12 of these 15 estates were between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000 net.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the percentage that the gentleman refers to depend upon the amount received by the heir or the total amount bequeathed by the deceased?

Mr. RAMSEYER. It depends upon the total net amount left by the deceased.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. So that the 50 per cent would be taken first and the division made afterwards?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Certainly, but remember that the 50 per cent rate in the Senate amendment only applies to net estates over $100,000,000. If our experience in the future shall be like that in the past we will have no such estates. Up to date there has been no estate amounting to more than $100,000,000 net. In view of our past experience, to place an inheritance tax of 50 per cent on net estates over $100,000,000 is a mere farce. If we really want to impose a 50 per cent rate on swollen fortunes and realize something therefrom, the 50 per cent rate must be made to apply to a sum very much less than $100,000,000. Men of large wealth have learned to break up or to distribute their estates before they die, and undoubtedly in the future there will be even more of that than there has been in the past.

The other statement from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] to which I wish to call your attention is as follows:

There are a number of States which tax inheritances 30 to 35 per cent. So the consequence would be that instead of having a 50 per cent tax you would have an 85 per cent tax. You would leave but 15 per cent of the estate after it got in the hands of the devisees, and no man * * * would advocate the taking of 85 per cent away from those inheriting estates.

When that statement was challenged by me the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] referred to the State of Arkansas and other States, without naming them, where the combined Federal and State inheritance taxes would have that effect. I hold in my hand Newcomb's Inheritance Tax Charts, compiled in November, 1920, giving the inheritance tax rates of every State in the Union that has an inheritance tax law. In nearly every State in the Union where inheritance taxes are imposed the rates fixed are dependent on the size of the estate and the degree of relationship of the beneficiary to the deceased. Usually the tax rates on estates that go to near relatives are low while the tax rates on estates that go to collateral heirs and strangers are higher. The higher inheritance tax rates imposed by any State on collateral heirs and strangers are those imposed by the State of Arkansas. The next highest are those imposed by the State of California. Arkansas imposes a maximum tax rate of 32 per cent on estates, or on parts of estates which go to distant relatives and strangers, and the State of California imposes a maximum rate of 30 per cent on the same class of beneficiaries.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Let me first restate that the inheritance-tax rates of the States are determined by the size of the estate and the degree of relationship that the beneficiary bears to the deceased.

Mr. WINGO. Not only that, but the rate is graduated. The 32 per cent applies only to a certain excess above a certain amount. It starts at 1 per cent and goes on up 2 per cent, and so on, and then after you reach a certain high amount, on the certain excess that high rate applies.

Mr. RAMSEYER. In Arkansas on estates going to near relatives the rates are graduated from 1 to 8 per cent. The 8 per cent is the maximum and applies to estates over $1,000,000.

Mr. GARNER. And all these taxes in very nearly all the States are collateral taxes, and do not apply to near relatives.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is true with reference to the high rates to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] referred. The 32 per cent maximum rate in Arkansas applies only to estates going to beneficiaries distantly related or not related at all. Evidently in Arkansas they realize as little from this high rate as the Federal Government would realize from a 50 per cent rate on estates over $100,000,000. During the last fiscal year the total inheritance taxes collected by the State of Arkansas were only $85,376.11. Large estates of men without any near relatives are very few indeed. Therefore, such high rates will rarely, if ever, apply to any estate. As Arkansas has been called into this discussion by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] as a horrible example of the effect of the Senate amendment, I call your attention to the rates in Arkansas. First are the group 1 beneficiaries, including a father, mother, husband, wife, child, brother, sister, wife or widow of son, husband of daughter, adopted children or mutually acknowledged child. The rates are as follows: One per cent between $3,000 and $5,000, 2 per cent between $5,000 and $10,000, 3 per cent between $10,000 and $30,000, 4 per cent between $30,000 and $50,000, 5 per cent between $50,000 and $100,000, 6 per cent between $100,000 and $500,000, 7 per cent between $500,000 and $1,000,000, and 8 per cent on all over $1,000,000. Beneficiaries in group 2 under the Arkansas law are any other person or corporation. The rates in this group are as follows: Four per cent between $500 and $5,000, 8 per cent between $5,000 and $10,000, 12 per cent between $10,000 and $30,000, 16 per cent between $30,000 and $50,000, 20 per cent between $50,000 and $100,000, 24 per cent between $100,000 and $500,000, 28 per cent between $500,000 and $1,000,000, and 32 per cent on all over $1,000,000.

The highest maximum rate imposed by any State on near relatives is by California, where the tax rates are from 1 per cent over the exemption to $25,000 to 15 per cent on estates over $1,000,000. The maximum rates in other States on estates going to near relatives either by inheritance or by bequest are much lower, ranging from 2 to 4 per cent in most States, 7 per cent in Illinois, 6 per cent in Massachusetts, 4 per cent in New York, 10 per cent in Oregon, 2 per cent in Pennsylvania, and total exemption in Texas.

Now, is there any foundation for the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that "you would leave but 15 per cent of the estate after it got in the hands of the devisees"? Under existing Federal law the net estate of $1,000,000 pays a tax of $51,500, or a little more than 5 per cent. An estate of $10,000,000 pays $1,681,500, or about 16 per cent. An estate of $50,000,000 under the Senate amendment would have paid $14,681,500, or a little more than 29 per cent. Although there is no use for practical purposes to figure estates over $50,000,000, because they are very rare, I will nevertheless give you the Federal tax on a net estate of $100,000,000, which would be $34,681,500 with the Senate amendment, or a little less than 35 per cent.

Members of Congress making appropriations are accustomed to deal with sums amounting to hundreds of millions and billions of dollars. It ought not to be necessary to call your attention to the fact that an estate of $1,000,000 is a large estate, that estates of $10,000,000 are unusually large, and estates of over $50,000,000 are very, very rare. I am dealing with large estates only to demonstrate that the statements of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] are utterly impossible.

Take the extreme case of the State of Arkansas, referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], and the inheritance tax rates which apply only to distant relatives and strangers, the combined Federal and State inheritance taxes in Arkansas on a net estate of $1,000,000 would be but $303,700, leaving more than 69 per cent of the estate for the devisees or heirs. On an estate of $10,000,000 in the State of Arkansas the combined taxes would be $4,813,700, leaving nearly 52 per cent of the estate for the devisees or heirs. A net estate of $50,000,000 in Arkansas would pay combined taxes with the Senate amendment of $30,613,700, leaving nearly 40 per cent of the estate for the heirs or devisees, and on a net estate of $100,000,000 the combined taxes would be $66,613,700, leaving about 33 per cent of the estate for the devisees or heirs.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD ought to be an encyclopedia of accurate information. That it is not is very regrettable, indeed. Especially should gentlemen having charge of a bill weigh carefully every statement that they insert in the RECORD. I doubt very much the existence of estates where the combined Federal and State inheritance taxes, even with the Senate amendment, which was defeated by the House, would take as much as 50 per cent of such estate. I am sure such estates do not exist in Arkansas, and I do not believe that they exist in any State when the time for administration is reached.

In order to get down to something practical and tangible and to bring this controversy to a head, I challenge the gentleman from Ohio, or any other gentleman, to cite a single estate that has been administered on since 1916, or any single fortune in existence where the Federal estate tax rates, with Senate amendment 582, combined with the State inheritance tax rates of the State or States in which such estate or fortune is located, would leave less than 50 per cent of such net estate or fortune for distribution among the heirs or devisees.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7102) to fix standards for hampers, round stove baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we may have one hour of general debate, one-half to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that there may be one hour of general debate, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourns to-day, a little more than seven months shall have elapsed since our meeting on April 11. As the Congress stood in recess from the 24th of August to the 21st of September, and the House did not meet for the transaction of business until the 3d day of October, the actual session of the House has been practically six months. During that period 136 bills and resolutions have been considered by both Houses, and have become laws, in addition to which 135 bills and resolutions have passed the House and are now before the Senate. This is a total of 271 bills and resolutions considered by the House, or almost 2 per day.

When the gavel falls to-day on the final adjournment of the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress the House of Representatives shall have considered and passed upon all of the measures for the consideration of which the Congress was convened in extraordinary session. In addition to this, all of the measures of primary importance that have been brought to our attention or considered to a conclusion by our committees have been considered and disposed of by the House except the bill for the reclassification of Federal employees, which is unfinished business to be disposed of early in the December session; the matter of congressional apportionment which, twice considered, has not been finally disposed of by the House; and the so-called antilynching bill, which is on the calendar and scheduled for early consideration in December.

Judged either by the volume of the business transacted or the highly important character of the questions and problems considered and passed upon, this six months' session, so far at least as the House of Representatives is concerned, may be properly classed as one of the most diligent and important sessions in the history of the American Congress. [Applause.] In no Congress in our history has better progress been made in the consideration of the important questions of taxation and revenue. In no Congress has the House of Representatives in the same period of time considered and passed so much legislation of commanding importance. [Applause.]

WORK OF THE SPECIAL SESSION.

The President convened the Congress in extraordinary session primarily for the purpose of the enactment of legislation revising the tariff and the tax laws, and this has been the most important work of the session. The tax revision, a most difficult and trying work, has been completed, and the American people will find a real and substantial cause for thanksgiving in the fact that they are relieved for the present calendar year of Federal tax burdens in the sum of $70,000,000—a relief, all of which is lifted from the shoulders of heads of families of modest and moderate means and income. There ought to be and will be additional enjoyment of the Thanksgiving holiday by reason of the fact that under the new tax law, and beginning January 1, there will be a further lifting of the Federal tax burden in a sum estimated at $835,000,000 for the calendar year. [Applause.]

BURDEN LIFTED EQUITABLY.

This lifting is distributed equitably among the people of the country. The Federal tax gatherer will no longer collect taxes on ice-cream cones, soda water, pills and lotions, or parcel post, nor exact tribute on transportation or on the purchase of wearing apparel. The man of moderate means, and particularly such a man with a family, has his income tax burdens appreciably lightened, while those classes of taxation which are most successfully passed on to the consuming public or which most hamper and retard business transactions and discourage or prevent the growth and development of productive enterprise, like the excess-profits tax and the higher brackets of the surtax, are either repealed or reduced.

REASON FOR THANKSGIVING.

The Thanksgiving dinner, whether plain or elaborate, will be more palatable, in view of the fact that this tax bill when in full operation will relieve the American people of almost a billion of the tax burdens they now bear, and this relief, it should be remembered, is a relief to all of the people, for whoever may primarily pay the tax, eventually it is borne by all consumers.

There has been considerable impatience and criticism voiced in the country because the tax revision bill has not been sooner placed upon the statute books. This impatience, this criticism is quite natural and to be expected. Tax burdens of the war were heavy and many of them of the most exasperating and inequitable character. It was natural that people should clamor for early relief. This criticism could not and did not take into consideration the very difficult, trying, and complicated character and infinite variety of the questions and problems presented in the revision of a law so voluminous and complex as the war revenue act. The fact is that with the signing of this bill its consideration will have covered less time than the consideration of any general revision of tax legislation in many years.

THE FORDNEY TARIFF.

The House passed the Fordney tariff bill, providing a general revision of tariff schedules, on July 21, and the measure is now before the Senate committee, and we entertain the hope and have the assurance that this legislation, so essential to the establishment of a sound and dependable basis and foundation for trade and industry, will be reported to the Senate and considered at a reasonably early date in the regular session, which begins December 5. There is always ground for honest difference of opinion with regard to the details of schedules even among those who believe in the principle and policy of protection, and no tariff ever has been or ever will be in all of its details and in all of its thousands of items and provisions ideally perfect or wholly and completely satisfactory.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I prefer not to yield just now.

Notwithstanding the inevitable difference of opinion with regard to provisions and schedules of a tariff bill, the fact remains that the tariff bill as passed by the House met less criticism, not only from the standpoint of those who believe in the principle of protection but from others who endeavor to analyze a tariff measure from the viewpoint of its effect on the business, industry, and production of the country, than any like measure that has passed the House in many years. There are sharp differences of opinion with regard to some of the more important features of the bill, like the new provision for American values.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In regard to the American valuation, I do not know whether Members are aware of it, but Great Britain has within the last month passed a tariff bill providing for home valuation, which is the same proposition that we have.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman for that information.

All these matters will be considered by the Senate and in conference, and we may confidently expect a measure the very best that can be enacted at this time of varying costs and unsettled currencies.

THE MORE IMPORTANT MEASURES THAT HAVE BECOME LAWS.

I shall hope in the time allotted to me to refer in some little detail to the more important bills that have become laws in this session. Lest I shall omit some of them in my discussion I shall refer to them first only by title. They are as follows:

The revenue act of 1921.
The budget act.
The emergency resolution.
The peace resolution.
The Veterans' Bureau act.
The immigration restriction act.
The Volstead Antibeer Act.
The $25,000,000 farm loan act.
1922 Naval appropriation act.
1922 Army appropriation act.
The grain futures act.
The packers' act.
The war finance agricultural loan act.
The Federal highway act.
The maternity act.
Act for the apportionment of waters of the Colorado River.
Legislation and appropriation for the Shipping Board.
The Edge Export Act.
The cable control act.
The Indian Bureau act.

Mr. Speaker, we will now discuss briefly, if the time allows, though not in the order in which I have named them, these more important laws.

THE ANTIBEER ACT.

The so-called Volstead antibeer bill became necessary as a result of an eleventh-hour decision by Attorney General Palmer the day before the close of the Wilson administration. While there has been much sharp difference of opinion with regard to the provisions of the measure, it is believed that the bill is a fair compromise, maintaining the national faith in the enforcement of the prohibition act, while guarding against the possibilities of abuses of power and authority.

THE BUDGET ACT.

The bill providing for a budget system brought to a realization the hopes of those who have been laboring for a generation or more for a more businesslike, scientific, economy-urging system of estimates, appropriations, and expenditures. We have already experienced great benefits through the establishment of a budget system in the checks which have come through that system upon the expenditures of the executive departments. The influence and agencies of the budget system, under the direction of the President as the head of that system, brought the decisions relative to economy in expenditure which made possible the lifting of so large a portion of the Federal taxes in the tax reduction bill. The budget law has already justified the highest expectations of its friends and framers, and there is every reason to believe that it will prove to be what has been claimed for it—the greatest reform in governmental procedure in half a century.

The energetic and splendid administration of this act by Gen. Dawes, with the full support of the President, loyally given, and extended at all times at every point, has led to a reduction of the expenditures of the Government in terms of tens if not hundreds of millions of dollars. [Applause.] Never in American history has a law been placed on the statute books that took so long and so helpful a step toward the establishment of proper business conditions in the affairs of the Government and toward the establishment of true, proper economy. [Applause.]

THE PEACE RESOLUTION.

The peace resolution declared the end of a state of war, the existence of which was proclaimed by the war declaration. It placed us in a position of official peace with Germany and Austria, and paved the way for the negotiations since entered into for the reestablishment of normal peace relations with our late enemies.

VETERANS' BUREAU ACT.

The so-called Sweet bill, establishing a Veterans' Bureau and consolidating all of the agencies charged with care and responsibility on behalf of the ex-service men, is the fulfillment of a national obligation to provide an organization which, so far as it is possible to do so, will cure the delays which have been complained of in meeting our obligations to our national defenders. Under this bureau it is hoped that there will be little cause for complaint, and that the appropriations of Congress, which will total approximately one-half billion dollars for this fiscal year, may be utilized to the best possible advantage for the benefit of the soldiers of the late World War. [Applause.]

THE FARM PRODUCTS WAR FINANCE ACT.

The bill amending the War Finance Corporation act, to provide relief for producers of and dealers in agricultural products, is expected to afford a very large measure of relief in its provisions, under which the War Finance Corporation may issue and utilize its securities in a sum not to exceed a billion dollars to aid in the carrying and exportation of agricultural products and in providing credit for agricultural purposes, including the breeding, raising, fattening, and marketing of live stock. The measure will, it is believed, have a most beneficial effect in providing markets for our surplus of agricultural products and in relieving the strain on agricultural credits during the period necessary for the development and preparation of these products for the market.

We inherited from the war a condition which might easily have brought industrial disaster and bankruptcy to the country. The passage of this act and other legislation of this session has enabled the cotton grower and the corn grower, the wheat grower, and the cattle grower, from Texas to Montana, and agriculturists in all parts of the country, laboring under the heavy load of a tremendously depressed market and prices far below the cost of production, to weather the storm. They have afforded the farmer protection from disaster and thus insured a continued supply of the essential products of agriculture for the American people.

THE FEDERAL HIGHWAY ACT.

The Federal highway act, which became a law November 9 as an amendment to the Federal aid act, carried out the President's recommendations with regard to needed and essential changes in the Federal road aid act, particularly with a view to centralizing authority in the States and insuring the upkeep of Federal aid roads. The act made an appropriation of $75,000,000 for Federal aid in road building for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and of $5,000,000 for forest roads and trails for the same fiscal year, and $10,000,000 for the same purposes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923. This is a measure of the highest importance. It provides much needed amendments to the Federal road aid act, insures the continuance of Federal aid and participation in road building throughout the country, will insure the continuation of this highly important work, and will aid in giving employment to many thousands of persons.

MATERNITY AND INFANCY ACT.

The Republican platform declared "the supreme duty of the Nation is the conservation of human resources through an enlightened measure of social and industrial justice." The President, having in mind this party declaration of national duty, in his message to Congress at the beginning of the session, said:

I assume that the maternity bill, already strongly approved, will be enacted promptly, thus adding to our manifestation of human interest.

There has been considerable difference of opinion with regard to this measure, in the Congress and in the country, both as to the policy it invoked and with regard to its provisions. The newly enfranchised women voters, so far as their views were expressed, were almost unanimously favorable to the measure. It appealed to the conscience and sympathy of all as a measure asserting national leadership for the purpose of stimulating the States and communities in the tremendously important work of the protection of maternity and infancy. The bill provides for cooperation between the National Government and the several States and authorizes an appropriation of approximately $1,500,000 for the current fiscal year, which may be increased in the sum of $1,000,000 a year for five years.

The measure as reported by the committee and passed by the House differed quite materially from the bill as it passed the Senate, and the bill as thus amended was promptly adopted by the Senate. The enactment of this measure is not only creditable to the Congress as "adding to our manifestation of human interest," as stated by the President in his message, but as a prompt fulfillment of our platform pledges. Both parties in the last campaign made promises to the new voters, the better half of mankind newly invited into participation in Government. Those promises have been kept at least partially, and so far as they were definitely made in platforms and in presidential statements by the passage of this act under which we encourage the States and cooperate with them in the highly important splendid and humanitarian work of the protection of maternity and infancy. [Applause.]

EMERGENCY TARIFF.

The emergency tariff on agricultural products is a measure, the enactment of which, checked, to a certain extent at least, the threatened flooding of our markets at a time when the reaction from high war prices had brought many of the agricultural products of the country to a price far below the cost of production. Conditions which no legislation could change or modify have continued their depressing effect on many staple agricultural products, and yet the emergency tariff, promptly passed and recently extended, has undoubtedly so steadied the markets as to prevent wide fluctuations and further low levels of prices which, while infinitely harmful to the producer, would have brought but little, if any, benefit to the ultimate consumer. The recent extension of this act will carry its benefits to the time when permanent provision may be made in the enactment of the Fordney tariff bill.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

The immigration restriction act provides in a practical and workable way for the staying of the great volume of the tide of immigration threatened as an after effect of the war. While America regrets even partially to close her gates against those who in good faith and with good intentions seek our shores, this measure was necessary as a means of preventing a flood tide of immigration, not all of a desirable character, and beyond our capacity to speedily assimilate.

The doors of free America have always swung open for the oppressed of all lands, for those seeking to better their conditions, and we desire to keep them open, provided, however, that we shall not allow this flood to come more rapidly than we can assimilate the newcomers to the ideas and ideals of true Americanism, the principles of liberty under law; and so for the time being we have restricted the coming immigrants, welcoming as many as we believe to be safe for America, and we stand ready again to widen the door when conditions have arrived under which we may be able thoroughly to Americanize a larger number of the well-intentioned people who may seek a home and haven here.

THE PACKERS' ACT.

The so-called packers' bill, to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live-stock and dairy products, poultry, and eggs, is a wise, sound, and sensible measure, bringing to a close a long-drawn-out controversy relative to legislation affecting the meat-packing and allied and associated industries and activities which, while avoiding the radical and dangerous experiments which had been urged, does place in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture authority to regulate these industries in the public interest.

ANTIGAMBLING IN GRAIN FUTURES ACT.

The bill preventing gambling in grain futures, while permitting those dealings in grain which are believed to be legitimate and useful, if not essential, to the maintenance of proper market conditions, condemns and penalizes those operations which are purely speculative and harmful in their nature.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION ACT.

The Naval appropriation bill, bequeathed to this special session from a former Congress, became a law with a reduction and saving of $86,000,000 below the sum carried by the same bill in the closing days of the last Congress.

ARMY APPROPRIATION ACT.

The Army appropriation bill, which also came over to us from the former Congress, as it became a law reduced the Army to 150,000 men and the appropriation $15,000,000 below what the bill carried when pocket vetoed by President Wilson, because he then considered it too low.

FUNDS FOR FARM LOAN BOARD.

The bill making provision for an additional Treasury deposit of $25,000,000 for the Farm Loan Board makes available for that important farm-loan agency a total working capital of $50,000,000, and places the Farm Loan Board and banks for the first time since their organization in position to function continuously in the making of loans to the farmers of the Nation.

FACILITATING EXPORTS.

The amendment to the Edge bill, providing for the promotion of export trade by facilitating the organization of corporations, was intended to and has very greatly aided, assisted, and facilitated the organization and the operation of those useful agencies.

TELEPHONE ACT.

The bill providing for a much-needed consolidation of independent telephone companies rendered possible the reorganization whereby the losses through unwise duplication have been eliminated or greatly reduced, under which more satisfactory systems and more favorable rates should be secured.

CABLE ACT.

The bill under which the President is authorized to provide for the orderly and controlled landing of submarine cables remedied a situation which had greatly embarrassed the former administration and established a policy under which proper national control of these important agencies of communication is established.

SHIPPING BOARD APPROPRIATION.

The bill appropriating $48,000,000 for the Shipping Board is an unpleasant reminder not only of the enormous expenditures of over $3,500,000,000 in the building up of a merchant marine during the war; the almost unbelievable waste and extravagance which characterized that expenditure and development, but of the utterly indefensible methods that have been pursued in the handling of the fleet since its construction. Congress was called upon either to make a further contribution to this stupendous enterprise or to see the entire project shipwrecked in bankruptcy. The failure to appropriate to keep the enterprise going during the period of rehabilitation would have simply deferred the day of expenditure, added enormously to the ultimate outlay, and threatened the entire project. It is believed that under the new management order may be brought out of chaos and a reasonably satisfactory condition finally established.

INDIAN BUREAU ACT.

The act broadening the organic law of the Indian Bureau in a manner to make in order the ordinary and usual items on the Indian appropriation bill is an important measure made necessary by the adoption of the budget system and the modification of the rules of the House in connection therewith. The passage of this bill calls attention to the highly important reform which came as an incident of the adoption of the budget under which Senate amendments, which were offered in the House, would be subject to a point of order, can not be accepted by House conferees but must be presented to the House and receive an affirmative vote before being accepted. This is a highly important reform, largely curing the evil of legislative riders and appropriations not specifically authorized by law.

COLORADO RIVER BILL.

The bill providing for an agreement among the Western States for the disposition and apportionment of the waters of the Colorado River is an important measure, marking a new and beneficial policy in the settlement of the vexed questions arising out of the use of the waters of interstate streams for the purpose of irrigation. The famous Kansas-Colorado case is the most important of the suits that have been before the courts testing the question of the relative rights of the various States in the arid region where irrigation is practiced, to the waters of an interstate stream. It is much better, where it is possible, to have an adjustment and settlement of these questions in advance of the appropriation and use of the waters than to wait until rival claims have been established, and then settle the vexed questions, frequently at great loss to those who have expended money in irrigation enterprises.

ACT PROVIDING FOR COMPLETION OF ALASKAN RAILWAY.

This Congress was called upon to determine the question as to whether, having made large expenditures in the building of the Alaskan Railway, we should continue that work to completion. The final estimate of the former administration that the road could be completed for approximately $52,000,000 was found entirely inadequate, and it became necessary either to authorize the appropriation at the proper time of the sum necessary to complete the road or leave it in an incomplete and unsatisfactory condition and of little use or benefit.

After careful consideration the House authorized an appropriation of $4,000,000 for the completion of the road. The expenditure of this sum will undoubtedly be extended over several years, as the Appropriations Committee will only make appropriations in the sums that seem necessary to carry on the work in a most economical way. With the completion of this line it is hoped that the development of Alaska, at least that section which has been tapped by the road, will be greatly aided and will continue steadily.

AMENDMENT OF WAR MINERALS RELIEF ACT.

The act for the relief of those who had responded to the call of the Government departments for the production of war minerals and who were subject to losses by the sudden termination of the war was so narrowly construed by the commission authorized to adjudicate claims under it that it became necessary to broaden somewhat the provisions of the act, or, rather, to enact in more definite language what was the intention of Congress in the first instance. The passage of this act will relieve many worthy claimants of small means who responded patriotically to the request of the Government for the production of war minerals.

In addition to the bills I have mentioned, the following bills have become laws, in addition to private, pension, and bridge bills, which I shall not take the time to enumerate:

BILLS PASSED BY THE HOUSE.

FORDNEY TARIFF BILL.

I have already referred to the tariff bill which has passed the House and is now before the Senate. Hearings have been held by the Senate committee on many of the schedules, and it is hoped the bill will be considered by and pass the Senate at a reasonably early period in the December session. It is highly important that this general revision become a law at an early date. It is true, as has been suggested, that these are difficult times in which to enact a permanent tariff law. Entirely accurate estimates of foreign costs are impossible. Fluctuating currencies of a number of the great industrial nations of the world present most serious difficulties in connection with tariff adjustment, and yet notwithstanding these conditions it is highly important—it is, in fact, essential to the restoration and preservation of sound business conditions in America—that our manufacturers and producers and their employees shall know definitely what the tariff schedules are to be for the immediate future at least, and that these schedules shall give the benefit of the doubt to the employer of American labor rather than to the foreigner or the importer.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

The bill for the amendment of the transportation act of 1920 to enable the War Finance Corporation to handle the securities placed in the hands of the Government by the railroads in connection with the funding, as provided by the transportation act, of a portion of the sums due the Government from the railroads on account of expenditures for betterments and equipment during the period of Federal control, is one of the most useful and helpful measures which has been considered by the Congress.

Under this bill railroad securities, that would otherwise lie in the Treasury unproductive, except for the interest rate they carry, would be placed in the hands of the investing public, and the money thus secured could be utilized for the purpose of meeting Federal obligations to the railroads and otherwise. Those who have studied the questions involved in this legislation are of the opinion that the funding of a considerable portion of the sum due the Government by the railroads, on account of betterments and equipment, and the sale by the War Finance Corporation of the securities thus placed in the hands of the Government, will greatly improve the business situation throughout the country by relieving the railroads from the necessity of making large payments on capital account out of current revenues, and thus leave them in a position to pay other bills for supplies and equipment, many of which are now overdue.

The relief of the situation thus provided will also place the railroads in a financial condition in which it will be possible to bring about a reduction in freight and passenger rates much more speedily than otherwise would be possible. It is to be hoped that we are nearing conditions where a reduction of rates would within a reasonable time be followed by an increase of business that would more than make up for the losses that would result from the rate reduction. It is true, however, that the roads could not weather even a temporary period of reduced revenues if they are to be compelled to meet and pay immediately out of earnings their obligations to the Government for expenditures which are properly chargeable to capital account. It is important, therefore, that the relief this bill proposes be provided in the interests of all the people who are anxious for rate reduction.

If the operations which the bill authorizes the War Finance Corporation to undertake prove successful, the measure will be highly beneficial to the railroads and through them to those from whom they buy supplies, and it will also prove a boon by increasing the available cash in the Treasury.

THE FOREIGN DEBT REFUNDING COMMISSION BILL.

This Congress has had no more important question before it than that of providing for a commission to treat with our foreign debtors and to arrange with them as to the terms of payment of the principal and interest of the foreign debt, amounting to more than $11,000,000,000, which they owe us. Had the former administration proceeded in full conformity with the law, these obligations would have all been funded and time and terms of payment agreed upon, and nothing further would have been necessary. While the Secretaries of the Treasury of the Wilson administration may not have acted contrary to law, they certainly did not carry out the directions and provisions of the law in full, and, on the contrary, did enter into an agreement with our foreign debtors whereby all interest payments were delayed for a period of three years, and the only obligations taken were mere I O U's, with no definite stipulation as to conditions of payment.

In this state of affairs it became necessary to legislate a grant of authority for the handling of this tremendously important matter, involving not only the vast sum of more than $11,000,000,000, but affecting our relations with Armenia, Austria, Belgium, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, France, Great Britain, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Liberia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, Russia, and Serbia—all of whom owe us sums ranging from a few thousand dollars to hundreds of millions of dollars.

The legislation creates a commission of five members, with the Secretary of the Treasury as chairman, the others to be appointed by the President, who, subject to the approval of the President, are authorized to refund or convert and extend the time of payment of the principal or interest, or both, of the obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States. This is one of the most important pieces of legislation which has been passed by the House.

THE FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION FOR 1922.

Mr. Speaker, I regret I have not time to discuss at greater length the important measures that have become laws or been considered by the House. Fortunately no long speeches are necessary to emphasize or eulogize the work of the session now closing. That record will stand and speak for itself in eloquence that will not be denied long after the words we utter here to-day are forgotten. This splendid record, none better ever made by a legislative body since time began, will grow brighter and be more appreciated as time passes, as the ground fogs and the dust of conflict that always becloud the day of action clear away and this record shall be read in the unobscured and unprejudiced light of history. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I smile at the situation of the gentleman from Wyoming because it really is very funny. It has long been the custom as a session of Congress draws to its close for the majority leader to arise and have something to say by way of congratulations to his party upon what has been accomplished during the session. But in all good faith I wish to say that up until a few moments ago I had supposed that that would be omitted on this occasion. [Applause on the Democratic side.] However, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] evidently feels that there should at least be a plea of confession and avoidance, and so he has directed attention to some legislation and to more of effort.

The most of those things which he has specifically mentioned as having been accomplished are matters wholly nonpartisan and with the origination of which the party in power had no more to do than did the minority.

THE BUDGET ACT.

I might mention, for instance, the Budget Act. That was one of the first acts passed, and the gentleman from Wyoming complacently claims credit for his party. Of course, all persons in the United States familiar at all with its history are aware of the fact that the serious consideration of budget legislation began wholly as a nonpartisan proposition and was conducted as a nonpartisan proposition and was finally enacted into law by what was practically a unanimous vote. The majority did not originate nor are they any more responsible for its enactment than the minority, save only as they happened at the time to have more votes. So far as its administration is concerned that has not progressed to a point which enables us to speak with any degree of assurance as to what its real effects are. One of the outstanding things, however, has been that with the estimates so far sent down—and I ask some gentleman to correct me if I am in error—with the estimates so far sent down from the Director of the Budget, who has been widely advertised and who was so greatly praised by the gentleman from Wyoming, the Congress has found it necessary to do precisely what it has done for long years past under all administrations when estimates were sent in, namely, cut those estimates by millions and millions of dollars.

An illustration in point is the last emergency appropriation for the Shipping Board. With the approval of the Director of the Budget the Shipping Board had asked for $125,000,000 and Congress cut the amount, as I now recall, to $48,500,000.

The value of the budget legislation will be determined by its administration. It is interesting to read in the press every few days where "Gen. Dawes, Director of the Budget, has saved this $25,000,000 and that $50,000,000" by cutting out items included in estimates forwarded to him from this department or that. Some papers seem to keep standing headlines about "Dawes savings."

In very truth there is a considerable degree of piffle about these stories. Good advertising? Ah to be sure; creating an impression upon a tax-burdened people that savings are being made. But the people who are better informed than some seem to think will not be long misled by these psychological promulgations. Gen. Dawes deals with the department's estimates and then Congress will have to deal with his, and the final story—the denouement, the plot of the tale will not be unfolded until we strike the balance sheet at the end, and the majority will not convince the people that they have saved unless the people find the saving reflected in lower taxes, and this it does not now seem the majority expect to be able to show.

Estimates were sent in here, as has been pointed out—and it has already been placed in the RECORD, but I ask permission to reinsert them—estimates have been sent down by the Director of the Budget and have been granted by the Congress, for an amount of money for the Shipping Board that has enabled the Director of the Shipping Board to place upon the pay rolls more men at high salaries than were ever placed upon the pay rolls at any one time in all the history of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The list which I have in mind I take from the testimony of Mr. Schlesinger in the hearings before the Appropriations Committee on the Shipping Board deficiency. It contains those who had been employed as attorneys at that time the latter part of July, 1921.

ROAD LEGISLATION.

Another matter to which the gentleman referred was the road bill. Now, as a matter of fact there was absolutely no necessity whatsoever for the legislation which passed this session of Congress amending the former road act. When the President of the United States came before Congress and delivered his first address, the only address that he has here delivered, he demonstrated that he knew nothing about the language that was in the act that was originally passed—passed not as a partisan measure but by general votes upon both sides of the House—on the necessity of requiring State maintenance. The former law was as clear and as plain and as positive as is the present law upon that subject. And the only reason for having any amendment to it was simply in order to enable the majority party to say that they had amended a former law.

All that was really needed was the appropriation. This was withheld and delayed until some States which had formed their laws to meet the Federal acts and were dependent upon the Federal appropriation to let their contracts suffered in their organizations. Counties and other subdivisions were paying interest on money which they had borrowed to cooperate with State and Federal Governments—moneys which were lying idle in time of stress, all because the majority party chose to dilly-dally along under pretense of some additional legislation being necessary, when in truth the basic act of the Democratic administration was all sufficient, and an appropriation only was necessary.

In fact the bill enacted injured rather than helped the road legislation, in the opinion of many, and rumor has it that there is now a question being made as to whether the Department of Agriculture has not been stripped of its jurisdiction of the road law, and the same conferred upon either the Department of Commerce or the Interior Department, a thing the people never expected or desired.

ALASKAN RAILWAY.

Another matter referred to by the gentleman from Wyoming was the Alaskan railroad. Well, I suppose the country surely understands that what the majority have done at this session is simply to continue and provide for the completion of that work begun under the previous Democratic administration.

WAR VETERANS' ACT.

Again, the gentleman from Wyoming touches upon the War Veterans' Act. That passed by a unanimous vote. It originated in a nonpolitical committee. It was not the product of the brain of the majority party, but was the common work of both parties—a work of love and justice.

The troubles under that act grow out of the present policy in regard to its administration and for that the majority party are responsible. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, told you yesterday that out of every $100 being appropriated supposedly for the benefit of the disabled soldiers of the country $10.68 is going to pay for the administration of the act. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is indefensible. When the organization of the bureau was being built up confusion was unavoidable, but the time has come when that excuse no longer justifies the delays and the overwhelming administration charge pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois.

WAR FINANCE BILL.

The war finance bill—simply a revival, without a single change in the letter of the law, as I remember it, of the act which was passed during the Democratic administration.

IMMIGRATION.

The gentleman has referred also to the immigration restriction act. That, too, was a nonpartisan measure. The principle fight on it, such as it was, came from the Republican side, being led by Mr. SIEGEL, of New York. That act was not satisfactory; it was not fundamental; it was a compromise makeshift, not going to the roots of our immigration problem. The minority were helpless in their efforts to go further.

PACKERS' BILL.

The packers' act is listed for praise by the gentleman. We may well be very cautious in our praise of this bit of legislation until we discover just how far the reactionary influences in the Republican party succeeded in their efforts to hamstring the Federal Trade Commission.

ANTIBEER BILL.

The antibeer act, like all prohibition acts, at no time took on any partisan tinge. It is, however, noticeable that the gentleman from Wyoming speaks of it as being made necessary by "an eleventh-hour decision by Attorney General Palmer."

The idea intended to be conveyed by that expression is obvious. Frank statesmanship, untinged by partisan ambition, it would seem, would have in dealing with the great nonpartisan question been just enough to have stated that the official opinion of the Attorney General as to whether under the Volstead law beer might be prescribed as a medicine was not asked until almost at the end of his term. He could not have given it earlier. The correctness of that decision has not, so far as I am aware, been questioned by the present Attorney General, by any responsible authority of this administration, or by the leaders of the prohibition organizations of the country. Only a few politicians have made insinuations about it.

THE PEACE RESOLUTION.

The peace resolution is "pointed to with pride." How ridiculous! Not a step was ever taken under that peace resolution. No proclamation was issued by the Executive based upon it. That poor performance did nothing but make a bad precedent. All action has been taken under the treaty negotiated and ratified. It would be well for the Republican Party if they could expunge that resolution and everything connected with it from their record for all time to come.

There is no need to pursue the matters item by item. All that was good was nonpartisan, presented as such, discussed as such, and passed as such.

FAILURE UPON VITAL THINGS.

Upon those matters vital to the country, upon those supreme matters concerning which the party now in power promised (in so far as that colorless, evasive document known as the Chicago platform promised anything) relief to the people of the country, there has been a disgraceful, a distressing, and, what is destined to be to that party, a disastrous failure. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Wyoming has referred to the revenue act in terms of praise. Let me quote from another authority, who spoke of the revenue act. These are the words of one Mr. BOISE PENROSE, eminent in the councils of his party, long experienced in political activity. He said:

The revenue act of 1921 is a transitory or temporary measure. It does not place the tax system on a stable or a scientific basis.

He was quoted in the press as saying that it was a "make-shift."

In the legislative branches of the Government the party now in power has been in power for practically three years. At the very beginning of the last Congress, although invited by the Executive authority then to enter upon a revision of the tax laws of the country, the majority in the legislative branch dawdled in idleness while feeding upon passion, and did absolutely nothing.

SOME HISTORY.

The majority here may have forgotten a little very recent history. I am sure they would like the people to forget it. It is so interesting, however, that it must not be forgotten, and I take the liberty of refreshing the memories of men in regard to it.

When the Sixty-fifth Congress convened for its final session upon the first Monday in December, 1918, immediately following the elections of November that year in which the Republicans had elected a clear majority of the House and by the shameful occurrence in Michigan felt assured of their ability to organize the Senate, it began quite early to be noised abroad that in order to assure that President Wilson would call the Sixty-sixth Congress in extraordinary session, the Sixty-fifth would not be permitted to perform its constitutional functions and duties by passing the supply bills for the fiscal year 1919-20.

The failure of any one of the appropriation bills at the expiration of March 4, 1919, meant that an extra session of the Sixty-sixth Congress would have to be convened in time to pass it by June 30.

The President of the United States was at that time engaged in as arduous a task as ever confronted a statesman. He was trying to negotiate a treaty of peace at the end of the greatest holocaust of war ever experienced by mankind. It was known that he was shortly to return to France to continue in these negotiations; it was equally as well known that it was his intention so soon as his labor was completed to call the Congress or at least the Senate in extraordinary session and lay the results before that body for its action under the Constitution.

But notwithstanding these known facts; notwithstanding the issues of history and destiny that were at stake a group of Republican politicians swayed by partisan prejudice and personal hatred toward the President, deliberately determined that he should not have the time for undivided attention to the vast things of the world and his and their country.

Accordingly in the latter part of February, 1919, the most disgraceful filibuster in the history of this country began in the Senate of the United States and certain of the supply bills failed.

There was no effort at concealment of the fact of the filibuster though with cunning hypocrisy the real motive was never openly avowed. Instead it was insisted that the people had spoken; that the Republican Party had been given a commission (think of the gift of Michigan!) to legislate; that orderly processes could not be waited upon; that the regular constitutional date even for ordinary business must be advanced, tax questions must be tackled and revolutions consummated.

They had their way; they poisoned the public mind, they threw every embarrassment which passion-maddened ingenuity, selfish ambition, and insane jealousy could conceive upon a great man as he struggled for his country and all mankind amid uncongenial surroundings that were but poorly understood here, in what might have been—what may yet prove to be—the greatest gathering ever held by statesmen.

They sowed the wind and in misery the world is reaping the whirlwind. That they who sowed are reaping a share evokes no pity for them, but for their sins men and women everywhere, children hungry and starving, babes suckling at withered breasts—all are paying in torture and toil and tears.

The extra session was called. President Wilson was still abroad confronting the problems produced by the centuries of selfishness and greed in Europe and constantly shot at from the responsible party in the Congress of his own country.

He addressed to that Congress, the enemy of whose majority he well knew, a dignified message outlining certain suggestions and specifying certain fiscal and economic matters regarded as most pressing. At the forefront of these was that of the revision of internal-revenue taxation. This matter had not then become in any sense partisan. His message was a simple challenge to patriotism framed in a way that became a patriot.

His observations were seconded by the Treasury Department; were pleaded for by the business world. The opportunity for service lay then—such opportunity as a party has had but infrequently in history.

What resulted? Oh the shameful, sordid failure is too well known! It has taken time to realize it but people are realizing it now. In the heat of discussion over the peace treaty the responsible majority succeeded not only in evading but in concealing their responsibility and in creating the feeling that the Executive was responsible when in truth it was their own dereliction due perhaps in part to incapacity but more to cunning politics and unconscionable hatred.

All the committees of House and Senate were under Republican control throughout the Sixty-sixth Congress, yet no offer to revise the tax system was made. The only gestures made by the majority toward anything were made with doubled fists toward the White House.

They passed the appropriation bills pretty much as they had been prepared by the Democratic committees of the Sixty-fifth Congress; spent several hundred thousand dollars in investigations that have not resulted in a single constructive act of legislation, and finally quit on March 4, 1921, still so busy cursing Wilson as that they found little time to applaud Harding, or perhaps—but we will pass that.

The only excuse given during those years for not tackling the tax problem was "we must have full power; wait until we have all branches of the Government."

Come to think of it I guess that excuse was valid. If the revenue bill—the "makeshift," if I may quote, which will be presently signed was the majority's idea—nay, more, if that bill as it passed the House and as it was reported to the Senate with its lowering of taxes upon those most able to pay, with its loss of revenues, its complexities, and jokers—if that was the dream of the majority they acted with wisdom in waiting. No Democratic President would have attached his signature to that.

Your experts have been at work for months—aye, for years; the Treasury was open to the committees for the purpose of making whatever investigations were necessary. You passed an act under whip and spur, refusing to throw it open to general amendment here in the House. It went to the other body, passed there, and went to conference, and the conferees have worked out a proposition which it is supposed within the next few hours will be the law. And one of the most eminent authorities in the Republican Party says of it, on the very eve of its passage, after all the promises made, after all of the boasts of the superiority and statecraft of the Republican Party, that in the making of a tax bill here in times of peace they could not bring forth an act that was permanent or was destined to be permanent, but that the act is a transitory or temporary measure; that it does not place the tax system on a stable or scientific basis.

Not only have you enacted what you call a temporary measure but in the process of making what my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] denominated this "monstrosity" the Republican Party succeeded in splitting itself in twain, not only in the other branch of the legislative body, not only in this body, but you brought here, figuratively speaking, the President of the United States himself and deliberately placed him in the condition of Bret Harte's scientific gentleman who was hit in the front central portion of his anatomy with a piece of red sandstone, "and the subsequent proceedings interested him no more." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It will not escape public notice, I take it, that the tax bill was not called a temporary measure and a makeshift by the distinguished gentleman who presides over the Senate committee which framed it until it had been generally condemned by the press and the people. Before that it was heralded, even as I fear the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] would herald it now, if he dared, as a great piece of constructive permanent legislation in keeping with Republican policies and promises.

But let me ask this serious question of serious men here and everywhere: If with more than two-thirds of this House and almost as great a majority in the Senate after years of responsibility and long months of travail you can give the people nothing but a makeshift, a temporary, transitory measure, when, pray, may we expect a different one?

When will "time unfold what plaited cunning hides"? How long must people suffer while the Republican Party is developing capacity?

Let me suggest another thought for men and women who have been betrayed by this failure to ponder over during these long winter nights as they plan means for meeting next year's Federal taxes:

In their clamor for an extra session in 1919 for the alleged purpose of tax revision; in their delay of two years and eight months in attempting such revision, in the crassness and bungling apparent in the making of the thing just passed, the Republican Party is confronted by these alternatives:

If their clamor for the extra session of 1919, and their failure after having it to take action, was in order that the people might become resentful and rebellious under the war-tax burden and so vote for a change in executive administration, then the party stands convicted of resorting to methods violative of all the ethics of statesmanship and they should be turned from power.

If on the other hand they have done their best; if they have believed themselves to be honest and conscientious; if they have really tried to provide a tax measure which will give relief to business and industry and to distribute taxation equitably, then they stand convicted of stupidity and utter incompetency.

Neither horn of the dilemma is a pleasant one to seize. If they take the first it must be immediately cut off lest it gore them; if the second, then "boring for the simples" is inevitable. I leave them to their choice.

The gentleman from Wyoming said, if I understood him correctly, that when we adjourn this afternoon we would have passed all that the Congress was called in extra session to pass. Well, it was my information, it was certainly my thought, and I believe the thought of every person in this country, that when the Congress assembled it would deal in some way with the customs duties.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman misunderstood me as stating that Congress enacted all of the legislation which we were expected to take up in this session. I said the House had passed the laws, and so far as the House is concerned, the program had been carried out to the letter and to the finish.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I accept the gentleman's statement that he was referring to the House, but the great difficulty about that is that everybody who walks the streets, who reads the newspapers, who understands anything of public affairs whatsoever, is perfectly aware of the fact that the tariff bill which passed the House was not designed by its promoters to become the law, and it was never expected that it would become the law. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If all that the House has to do is merely to pass an enacting clause in these revenue matters, then the House has performed its duty.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. That is a rather broad statement that the gentleman has made, and it might be misleading if some one reading it should imagine that it was a statement of an exact fact as he understands it. Will the gentleman allow me to say that, so far as I know the view of the men who framed that bill and as far as my own opinion and the opinion of this side is concerned, we did expect this bill to become a law substantially as it passed the House, as most of the bills that we have considered at this session have? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the trusting confidence of my friend from Wyoming is such as to evoke pity, but not admiration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. If one may judge by the present revenue bill and by the tariff bill, as constructed by the Senate and the latter finally agreed to in conference, judging from the number of amendments adopted by the Senate and yielded to by the House, it must be a Senate measure.

While I am on my feet let me suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee if this is not the fact, that as I understand it the American people believed that when Congress came together its paramount duty was to pass a tariff measure and a revenue measure? The tariff bill is still pending, and the revenue measure, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, is a makeshift and a piece of instability from the standpoint of political science. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will yield, I understand the gentleman who made that statement takes that view of the matter because an amendment reported by the other side was unfortunately adopted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In view of that statement, it is rather interesting to note just what has been done on this matter of legislation. Both the tariff and tax bill had amendments offered on "the other side," to which the gentleman from Wyoming has referred. When we had the tariff bill up upon every substantial proposition that you permitted this House to vote on by way of amendment the Republican organization was whipped from end to end. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen of the majority might possibly get some good legislation if they would stop gagging the House, and when these important bills come before it for consideration permit the minority to at least offer the benefit of its wisdom. The results so far attained whenever that opportunity has been presented, both on the tax bill and the tariff bill, have been such as to be somewhat encouraging.

Let me repeat from Holy Writ a quotation which I ventured to make a few days ago:

"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets and stonest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not!"

But the gentleman from Wyoming reminds us that to-morrow is Thanksgiving and cites some things for which he hopes the people may be thankful.

Mr. Speaker, I presume the papers of this afternoon will carry to all sections of the United States the news that this Congress is certain to adjourn some time before midnight to-night, and I have a pretty firm belief that to-morrow in a million homes in America praise will go up in which the thought will be expressed, "We thank Thee, O Lord, for at last putting into the hearts of the leadership of that Republican Congress the thought that it should adjourn sine die." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve whatever remains of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, Congress has been in actual session for about six months, during which it has made a record in response to the call of the inexorable exigencies following the war that I think will command the admiration of all the country, including our opponents in the House, especially those who are free from partisan bias.

The evil results of the war were first felt by the farming interests of the Nation. Agricultural conditions liquidated immediately and the price of farm products went below prewar conditions. Corn that sold for $1.90 per bushel is now selling in parts of the West for less than 20 cents per bushel. The Congress took up the program of agricultural relief, and in at least five specific measures attempted to assist in the rehabilitation of that great industry.

We also found the entire industrial system as the result of the greatest convulsion the world ever saw in the most dislocated situation of our history which extended to the whole world. The world's credits were deranged, its exchanges were broken down, and its trade totally disordered. In order to cure it a temporary tariff measure was passed on behalf of the American farmer to bridge up to such a time as the permanent tariff measure could be passed. This measure, first limited in time, has been extended until displaced by the permanent bill. Its value to the farmer is especially noted in the case of wheat and wool.

The hopeless condition of industrial Europe is felt here in our own country. Our surplus product of the farm heretofore marketed in Europe is left unsold. Europe has not the money with which to buy and is also under the necessity to avoid all purchases which can be produced by themselves owing to the heavy debt. Many suggestions have been made on our ability to assist Europe. It has been suggested that we exempt American capital from taxation that invests in the rehabilitation of the industries of Europe. This proposal has not met with favor with either branch of Congress. It has also been suggested that American capital be encouraged to invest in European industrial securities. This is a matter of financial concern and not of Government function.

We have authorized the War Finance Corporation to loan upon approved securities a specified sum to European houses or businesses upon condition that money be expended for American agricultural products. This is the agricultural aid bill.

To better the farm condition at home we have enacted some remedial legislation.

(1) The packers' bill.

(2) The antigambling grain bill.

We have also increased the credit facilities for the farm by two amendments to the farm loan act. All these are now law. The House passed a bill to permit the well-established principle of collective bargaining to be employed by farmers. Action on this is not yet had in the Senate. All this was done to help to relieve the farmer from a most disastrous condition produced by the war which entailed a period of extravagance and waste never before observed.

In addition to this work of agricultural rehabilitation Congress took early steps to end the war by congressional resolution, after which the President took all necessary steps to complete the work by effecting treaties of peace with the Central Powers which cleared the way for the resumption of both trade and diplomatic relations.

Knowing the commanding necessity for governmental economy, Congress renewed its efforts for a national budget system, which had been vetoed by President Wilson, and enacted such a measure, which was signed by President Harding and which became operative with the beginning of the present fiscal year, July 1, 1921. This ends all pork-barrel legislation for time to come. The operation of this law is now displayed by the enforcement of the provision of the law for punishment of bureau heads who ignore the law by creating deficiencies. This one statute will go further to place the Government's business upon a sound and economic basis than any piece of legislation in our time, and will be one of the outstanding accomplishments of legislation.

Congress, alive to the hopeless European situation, took proper steps against the inevitable flood of immigration, which would further complicate our industrial problem and enlarge our unemployment to the great detriment of our own labor. At an early hour of the special session it passed the immigration law further limiting it to 3 per cent of the nationals already here.

Congress also corrected the weaknesses in the treatment of our disabled veterans by the creation of the Veterans' Bureau, by concentrating all agencies for this work under one responsible head. Instead of the necessity of applying to three distinct agencies, all separate, the soldier now applies to one person who acts at once. For this work the current year there has been disbursed nearly one-half billion dollars, something over $490,000,000, the measure of appreciation the Government shows to the maimed soldiers.

In addition to these measures Congress corrected the unfortunate condition to follow the decision of Attorney General Palmer which permitted the prescription of beer. While the framers of the original law never intended such construction, the decision made necessary further regulation to prevent the violation of the temperance legislation on the eighteenth amendment. This measure will be appreciated by the millions of our people who earnestly hope for an end to the evil of the liquor habit among our people.

In addition to all this, one measure urgently requested by the women of the country, the protection of maternity and infancy, has become a law.

The special session was called to enact a tariff and tax law. Both of these measures require time, and both come from the same committee. The tariff question was taken up first and was passed through the House by the latter half of July. Measured by other tariff bills, especially when it is noted that this bill contains at least 1,000 items not included in any previous tariff bill, the time consumed by the House was not too long. This measure is still in the Senate committee.

The tax bill was taken up by the House immediately upon the passage through that body of the tariff bill. It was sent to the Senate in August and becomes a law to-day.

The House also passed the railroad securities refunding bill, one of the most important measures of legislation. This is still in the Senate.

The House also enacted the foreign debt funding act, another widely important measure both for us and Europe. This is also awaiting action in the Senate.

These are the more important measures of a session which challenges the history of legislation for a better record of achievement.

The program was planned from a constructive basis to insure remedial legislation made necessary by a war that uprooted the economic principles throughout the world. It looked to rigid economy which respected the wishes of those responsible for this administration—

1. To cut every appropriation to the bone.

2. Defer all legislation that is not emergent if it carries additional appropriations.

3. Insure economy by rigid application of the budget principle.

It made especial effort to readjust the agricultural situation by the enactment of five specific measures looking to the relief of our first and greatest industry.

The House put through in record time four great industrial rehabilitation acts which look to the readjustment of industrial America in the interest of labor and capital—

1. Permanent tariff.

2. Tax revision.

3. Rail securities refunding act.

4. Funding foreign loan act.

Three of these await Senate action, which will be completed in regular session.

This session also responded to the needs of the thousands of our disabled soldiers. It responded to the wishes and welfare of millions of temperance men and women. It also respected that great body of mothers in America upon behalf of their pleas for a better state for maternity and infancy. It also answered the demand not to further congest the labor market by indiscriminate immigration. The House of Representatives was in actual session 139 days. During that time there were 9,775 bills and resolutions introduced. Of this number, 415 were considered by committees and reported to the House; 152 of these became law. I want now to raise the question whether we can find a finer type of leadership when measured by results achieved than we have seen displayed here on this side of the aisle during this session of Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I challenge the record of the Congresses that have ever met in our history to show such a complete program of achievement on the part of at least one branch of Congress as this House has consummated, and I believe the Members on both sides of the aisle will recognize that leadership and ability in the person of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], under whose guiding hand this program has been carried to completion. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, the country, fully alive to the most unusual problems of readjustment, is applauding the efforts of the administration. It does not minimize the seriousness of the situation. Harding in less than nine months of the presidency has reached a level of general good will and approval not reached by any of his predecessors. His genius to command the maximum ability of the Nation is well recognized and unreservedly approved by all classes. His ability for final and correct decision is now well understood and widely applauded. His well-known sympathy for the unfortunate, and his deep desire to forward such remedial measures as will meet with the approval of sound policy, his keen comprehension of economic law as it affects industrial problems, have marked him with general approval.

No one better understood the necessity of international composure nor more fully sensed the wisdom of selecting a sound diplomat for this work. In these months we have seen our international relations, sorely interrupted by the war, rapidly cleared with honor to ourselves and justice to all concerned. The treatment of the Panama-Costa Rica dispute, the Yap episode, the Mesopotamia embroglio, the Mexican problem, and the Russian proposal has marked Mr. Hughes as among the greatest of our country's diplomats, past or present. This reflects credit upon the man responsible for Mr. Hughes and his Cabinet.

While Congress was at work on readjustment to relieve unemployment, the President summoned to Washington the best talent on the subject, organized the machinery, and put it in motion to reduce this problem to the minimum. In the meantime, peace negotiations were conducted to enable us to resume proper diplomatic relations and thereby insure the most rapid readjustment of abnormal conditions to a more normal basis.

During these months the President was at work to complete the plans for a world conference in the interest of peace in the world. This conference has now been in session for about two weeks. Already such progress has been made as to thrill the entire civilized world. The President's was the "commanding voice of a conscious civilization" speaking for our 100,000,000 people demanding "less of armament and none of war." Mr. Hughes was the spokesman of the President's plan, and in 40 minutes of time he disclosed what appeared the most audacious program of limitation of armament ever conceived by a responsible head. During that 40 minutes while the Secretary of State, "speaking for the American delegation, acting under the direction of the President of the United States," this Nation grew more than it had ever grown in any 25 years of its history. It reached a level no one living could have believed he would see it reach.

In my judgment the conference can not fail now. No nation would dare to throw herself athwart the open way of so great a cause for humanity. Already all the nations have shown a most favorable attitude toward the magnanimous proposal of our country on behalf of lifting the war burdens. These burdens for Army and Navy in appropriations in 1916 were about $250,000,000. In the present fiscal year they are about $747,000,000. Our problem is to save at least $400,000,000 on these items alone, a tangible result of the conference if it succeeds, as it will succeed.

When we bring ourselves as Members of Congress to the position that we can view accomplishment with eyes undimmed by blind party prejudice, the cheap and puerile demagogic attack upon this administration by the minority will give way to a frank recognition of a program, broad in its scope, sound in its principles, effective in its remedies, world-wide in its reach, and put into operation in such brief time as to challenge the approval of all alike, both friend and foe. This will be the verdict of the country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

PRINTING COPIES OF THE REVENUE ACT.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 234.

Resolved, That as many additional copies of the pamphlet law of the revenue act of 1921 as can be printed for $500 be printed for the use of the House, to be distributed through the folding room, 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman give us any idea of when it is intended to adjourn to-day?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, yes; very shortly.

Mr. WINGO. You intend to adjourn very shortly?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Can the gentleman give us any idea of the hour?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman would hardly like to predict the exact hour, but he can assure the gentleman from Arkansas that we shall adjourn.

Mr. WINGO. Has the Senate concurred in the conference report?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not so far as I know.

Mr. WINGO. My understanding was that this resolution would be withheld for the present and be passed later on.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, the gentleman from Ohio feels so confident that adjournment will be had to-day that he thinks this resolution ought to be passed at once, as there will be a great demand for copies of the law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] spoke to me this morning about the passage of a similar resolution. I told him I thought there would be no objection. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] was making some objections at that time along some other lines. I spoke to the gentleman from Arkansas briefly about it, and after consulting with him I suggested to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] that it be deferred for a time. I did not mention any particular time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] was compelled to be absent this afternoon and he requested that I bring it up as soon as possible. This, I may say, will provide for the printing of between 13,000 and 14,000 copies. It is estimated that 10,000 copies can be printed for $383, and that it will cost $38 for each additional thousand copies, so that this will furnish between 13,000 and 14,000 copies.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman believe that will be sufficient?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think so, for the time being.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is all we can order by a House resolution—$500 worth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, when I concluded my remarks a few minutes ago I forgot to ask permission to extend my remarks in the Record. I now ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record in order to continue my praise of the achievements of this Congress. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I make a like request.

Mr. FESS. I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] make the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WORLD'S DAIRY CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying report of the Secretary of State, was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State communicating the desire of the Secretary of Agriculture for the postponement until 1923 of the world's dairy congress, invitations to which were authorized by the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture approved March 3, 1921.

Inasmuch as it appears that adequate preparations for the world's dairy congress can not be completed in time to permit it to be held in 1922, I ask that the recommendation for postponement until 1923 receive favorable consideration.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE,

Washington, November 23, 1921.

The message and report were ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

STANDARD MEASURES FOR FRUITS AND VEGETABLES.

On motion of Mr. VESTAL, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7102) to fix standards for hampers, round-stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

Mr. VESTAL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, a few days ago I discussed on this floor the case of Mark Glanvill, an immigrant alien, who refused to submit to our immigration laws, left Ellis Island in a huff, and made a vigorous protest to the British Government, which made his complaint an international matter. I have here the signed statement Glanvill made to the British Government. In it he describes his arrival on the good ship Orduna, going to Ellis Island, whose buildings he characterizes as prisonlike, and, among other things, he declares:

Presently we reached a wide passage, completely blocked by a seething mass of humanity, fifty in the extreme—Europe's worst; the very dregs of humanity—pushing, yelling, and cursing, men and women alike—

And so forth.

Mr. Chairman, that is the statement of the main reason why a South African subject of the British Empire refused to submit to the hasty inspection and examination provided by our immigration laws for all aliens entering this country. If the people of the United States fully realized that much of the present immigration, even though restricted, is of the character described by Mark Glanvill, they would demand the percentage be reduced from the present 3 per cent, with all its exceptions, to 1 per cent or even to no per cent. [Applause.] I was of that opinion one year ago, and I am to-day more firmly of that opinion. I am about to introduce a bill limiting alien immigration to near blood relatives of persons lawfully in this country—that is to say, to fathers and mothers, husbands or wives, and children. That is enough.

As I said, a great hue and cry was raised over Glanvill's failure to gain admission without submission to our immigration laws. The Church Union took it up. Even Great Britain protested until she learned the facts. There was much mawkish sentimentality—and continually is—as a result of the distorted facts and sensational stories told by those who would tear down what protective laws we have against undesirable and excessive immigration. Fortunately, however, there are high-class publications and patriotic, fearless editors that place America first and whose first thought and sympathy and sentiment are for America and Americans, our institutions, standards, and ideals. The Saturday Evening Post for this week contains a splendid editorial telling the truth about all these sensational Ellis Island stories, entitled "Ellis Island sob stuff," as follows:

ELLIS ISLAND SOB STUFF.

Though Congress has lately given some attention to the amendment of our naturalization laws, pressing legislation of one sort and another has held in abeyance consideration of a new immigration code. The Dillingham Act, which restricts the admission of aliens in any one year to 3 per cent of the number here, reckoned nationally by nationality, as shown by the census of 1910, automatically becomes inoperative on the 30th day of next June. In the meantime it will be the duty of Congress to frame, debate, and pass a new set of permanent restrictive measures of such a character that they may be relied upon to afford the country adequate protection in the unprecedented emergency that will confront it next summer.

Every day it becomes more apparent that the problem Congress has to face has changed from one of immigration to one of migration. Before the war emigration was an overflow from the thickly populated countries of Europe. During the next few years, unless drastic measures are taken to prevent it, the overflow will become a deluge, and whole peoples will sweep in, bags and baggage, rags and coffies, in such numbers that all previous immigration records will be dwarfed into littleness. That is precisely what various racial groups are hoping for and working for, with the assistance of such foreign-owned ocean-transport companies as regard the United States about as a contractor regards a public dump.

Opposition to restriction of immigration is unceasing and untiring. President Harding's signature on the Dillingham Act was scarcely dry before the enemies of the new law set to work to discredit it. Ocean liners raced across the Atlantic to land their human cargoes before monthly quotas should have been exceeded. Summoned to Washington, the representatives of offending lines promised to be good; but old habits are hard to break off and time-set methods are not suddenly abandoned.

Scarcely a week passes that the metropolitan newspapers of the Atlantic States do not print harrowing stories of the hardships wrought by the Dillingham law. One week the tender victim is a penniless but beautiful young girl who must be deported because her country's monthly quota has been exhausted; the next, it is a rich and gifted young student who must be excluded for the same reason, or some apple-cheeked old peasant woman whose plight would melt a heart of ice.

These moving tales are keened with the tremolo stop pulled all the way out, and constitute striking examples of what is known in newspaper offices as sob stuff. They are often followed by verbatim reports of the letter of protest addressed by the indignant victim of our barbarous law to his own Government.

There is no more doubt that the Dillingham law has caused occasional hardship to worthy aliens than there is that it has proved a protective measure of the highest importance, justified a hundredfold by the conditions that required its adoption. It should be remembered, however, that any immigration code worth the parchment upon which it is engrossed is bound to bear heavily and harshly in sporadic cases unless it contains provisions whereby official discretion is permitted to soften its rigors. In the past, official discretion has often been so grossly abused that the House Committee on Immigration will do well to be exceedingly chary of incorporating any but the narrowest of such powers in the legislation that it is now framing.

Unfortunately, a single case of beauty in distress skillfully played up in the newspapers makes a deeper impression upon many minds than the most authoritative recital of the disastrous effects upon our race and Nation that will inevitably take place unless we speedily reverse our old policies based upon the melting-pot myth and control immigration by rational restrictions. It takes a more vigorous mind to envision the dilution and the breeding out of our old Nordic stock fifty or a hundred years hence than it does to think concretely in terms of pretty penniless girls, sweet old peasant women, and earnest young students denied admission to our country. This is the psychological basis upon which rests the untiring press work of the antirestrictionists.

The Post then quotes from the paper of Mr. Madison Grant, author of The Passing of the Great Race, which paper I presented to the Members of the House a few days ago. Mr. Grant says:

The menace is not immigration in the old sense of the word, but is true migration of peoples on a scale never before known.

The Post carries another editorial, entitled "Melting-pot moonshine," and which reads in part:

The opposition to sane restriction of immigration was never so well organized as now. The Dillingham Act has frightened it into solidarity and its minutemen are ready for duty at an instant's notice. Chief of these are the representatives of the ocean transport companies. These men act as if they had vested rights in the United States as a dumping ground for their human cargoes. Such is the volume of false propaganda they have been circulating in Europe to stimulate emigration, already pressing hard upon the limits set by the Dillingham Act, that on the 5th of last August the emigration commission of the League of Nations, sitting at Geneva, unanimously adopted a resolution demanding its repression.

Shoulder to shoulder with the shipping men stand the racial groups, least blameworthy of all the enemies of immigration restriction. Then come those cheap Americans who demand foreign labor so cheap that it is dear at any price; and on the outskirts of the throng cluster those kindly, overcredulous souls who are still the bondslaves of a few outworn phrases, flimsy sophistries, and exploded beliefs.

Prof. Robert De C. Ward, of Harvard, hits the nail squarely on the head in a recent statement, in which he says:

Such a situation has never before confronted us. This is not "normal" immigration. It is a frenzy, a panic, a stampede, a mob, without calculation, without sound judgment; a seething mass of humanity with but one idea—America.

Dr. Henry Fairfield Osborn, the great authority on evolution, lately in an address to the International Eugenics Congress said:

We are slowly awakening to the consciousness that education and environment do not fundamentally alter racial values. We are engaged in a serious struggle to maintain our historic republican institutions through barring the entrance of those who are unfit to share the duties and responsibilities of our well-founded Government. The true spirit of American democracy, that all men are born with equal rights and duties, has been confused with the political sophistry that all men are born with equal character and ability to govern themselves and others, and with the educational sophistry that education and environment will offset the handicap of ancestry.

Prof. Osborn went on to say that there is no form of matter so stable as the germ plasm on which heredity depends, and that this accounts for the stubborn permanence of types and for the survival of their original qualities in admixtures. He added:

In the matter of racial virtues my opinion is that from biological principles there is little promise in the melting-pot theory. Put three races together and you are as likely to unite the vices of all three as the virtues.

Mr. Chairman, after having studied the workings of the 3 per cent immigration restriction law during the six months it has been in operation, I have decided to introduce a bill suspending for three years all immigration excepting only husbands, wives, and children of naturalized citizens or of aliens who have domiciled in the United States for three years and who have filed declarations of intention to become citizens, and to press such a bill for action. I believe such a bill will cure the defects of the present 3 per cent law. Travelers and visitors will be permitted to arrive with passports, but must not come as immigrants.

The United States can not afford to sit by idly and permit certain countries to give passports to those of their nationals whom these countries desire to get rid of. I have knowledge that one country at least has been giving passports bearing in words the warning that the bearer is barred from returning to the country of his nativity.

In several countries of central and eastern Europe subagents of steamship companies are reported by our consuls and others to be selling tickets on a commission basis, and in one or more countries emigration "delegates" are assiduously at work urging persons to hurry to the United States before quotas become exhausted.

The high cost of travel to the United States seems to be no barrier. Passage and expense money is provided from somewhere.

Henry Morgenthau, former ambassador to Turkey, is quoted as saying that 3,000,000 persons in the lands back of Constantinople would get to the United States if they could. I believe the statement is not exaggerated.

It is contended that the 3 per cent law has created unnecessary confusion at Ellis Island, even though the number admitted under its provisions from June 1 to November 30 has reached only the modest figure of 195,509. It is charged the law has put a premium on organization in the handling and documenting of prospective immigrants.

Suspension will cause the United States to forego the reception of many who might be welcomed, but it will also end misery and misunderstanding both here and abroad, and inasmuch as 3 per cent, 50 per cent, or any other per cent can not relieve a fraction of the distress, starvation, and death that must come to refugees and destitute and migratory bankrupt peoples for the next year, we are justified in undertaking a complete suspension except for immediate relatives.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, they have talked about everything this morning, but now we have the basket bill up for consideration, and that is another effort of the Federal Government to tell the producers how they shall fix up their produce for the consumers. The bill has a very dangerous feature in it, according to my conception. It delegates to the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States the authority, privilege, and right to say what kind of a basket or hamper the producers shall ship their products in.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the gentleman is talking about the bill: is that permitted under the general rules of the House? [Laughter.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, this bill, if gentlemen will stop and think about it, is presumed to safeguard the buyer of farm products, but in this very bill they make what they call a 1-bushel hamper of 32 quarts really a hamper of 33 quarts. You are endeavoring through the bill to force the producer of apples or potatoes and all classes of vegetables and fruits to give to the consumer 32.9 quarts for a bushel. You are fixing to rob the producer of vegetables in this country nine-tenths of a quart out of every bushel by making him give that much more for a bushel. The experts have passed upon this bushel hamper and have found that to be true. I can not say whether or not you have made the same mistake running down through all the others, but I know that is true of your 1-bushel hamper.

Mr. VESTAL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. VESTAL. I will give the gentleman some additional time; I think the gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. QUIN. I do.

Mr. VESTAL. Does the gentleman understand that the manufacturer with whom he talked about the bushel-basket measurement, about its holding more than 32 quarts—has the gentleman talked with him since that manufacturer talked with the Bureau of Markets and the Bureau of Standards?

Mr. QUIN. No.

Mr. VESTAL. I want to say that since the gentleman talked with the manufacturer, the manufacturer has talked with the Bureau of Markets and the Bureau of Standards and acknowledges that he was wrong, and that the measurements set out in the bill are absolutely correct; that the basket holds a bushel and no more, and that the trouble was in his own factory.

Mr. QUIN. I say that this proposition has been passed upon by the experts, and I have the typewritten figures to show that the measurements had in this bill are nine-tenths of a quart more than a bushel. That was shown me by the head of a large manufacturer of hampers in Copiah County, Miss. In other words, it lacks only one-tenth of a quart of being a 33-quart measure, and yet the gentleman does not dispute the figures. The fact is we give power to the Secretary of Agriculture to say what these measures shall be, what kind of material they shall be made of, whether the splint shall run straight up and down or in a circular way. It seems to me that the United States has poked its nose into the business of the people long enough and far enough. [Laughter.] During the war perhaps it was necessary to have such legislation, but that was a hardship on the people, and now there is no necessity for it, for we are at peace. I reckon that the President of the United States has issued the proclamation of peace, and if we are at peace are we to continue this type of paternalistic legislation with reference to the vital institutions of our country? Under this bill the farmer can not make his own baskets to ship his stuff to the market; he can not take it to town in a sack; but he must have a basket or hamper made of a certain type of material. Why, the Secretary of Agriculture could under this bill say that you can not have a basket made out of anything except spruce pine. You would have to go to Michigan or Oregon to get the material, pay the freight rate down to Mississippi or Texas, where they produce the bulk of vegetables of this country, in order that the people could have baskets and hampers to ship the products of the farm.

If this bill passes as it now is you vest the power and authority in the Secretary of Agriculture to do all these things when one section of the country has one growth of wood and another section another. It could not be made a universal standard of basket so far as the timber is concerned.

Oh, you say the Secretary of Agriculture will not do anything unreasonable. I know they have done unreasonable things in the past, and we must judge the future by the past. I know that the Secretary of Agriculture is not always a practicable man, and we must legislate with that in view.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. VESTAL. I yield to the gentleman an extra minute because I took some of his time.

Mr. QUIN. I thank the gentleman. The measure that is presented to the House at this time is changed to some extent from what it was before, but you destroy what little benefit you put into it by giving all the power to the Secretary of Agriculture to say what changes shall be made, what type of hamper the farmers of the country shall in the future ship their stuff in.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman seems to be very much worried about surrendering the control and authority to the Secretary of Agriculture, but he voted for the bill that gave him absolute control over building highways.

Mr. QUIN. Oh, it is not that way; no, sir. I voted for the Jones amendment. After you Republicans killed that amendment, of course, I voted for the bill to get the money for our roads. We did not want to let him or any other Federal officer say where the roads should be, or what the specifications should be. Of course, we wanted the money, but we did not propose to give up all our rights like you did and deprive the districts, counties, and the State of their rights. You fellows are putting this bill through. Surely you do not in your hearts propose to make the farmer bow to the Secretary and let him say what sort of a basket he shall put his fruit and vegetables in. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important question, and I do not think there is any quorum here. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina make the point of order?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir; I make that point of order. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I presume that the Members present understand that the House is simply marking time waiting for the Senate to act on the conference report on the tax bill which must be agreed to before we adjourn. For the information of those who are interested in final adjournment I will state that I have just been informed that they are now calling the roll in the Senate on the conference report, and it is hoped that at the expiration of the time I have left me for general debate that measure will be ready for the signature of the Speaker and the House will then be able to adjourn sine die.

You know, gentlemen, that I have a sense of humor and, of course, must appreciate the fact that this sense of humor was appealed to very strongly a little while ago by the valedictory addresses delivered by our Republican friends and especially by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess], chairman of the Republican congressional committee, or rather he was the last time I heard of that committee, but I understand it is drifting and disorganized just like the leadership of the Republican Party in this House. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] The gentleman said something about "liquidating" the farmer and how this Congress had "rehabilitated" him. I knew that there was something radically wrong with the condition of the American farmer, and I knew that the ill effects of the war on him had been accentuated, and now we have the explanation. The Republican Party, which has been in complete control of both branches of Congress for nearly three years, has been "liquidating" and "rehabilitating" him. The Republicans claim credit for the changed condition of the American farmer since they got control of Congress nearly three years ago. No wonder wheat has gone down to 80 cents. That is the effect of the "liquidation" and the "rehabilitation" which the Republican Congress has indulged in. You give to the farmer a little more "rehabilitation," as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess] says you have given him, and the American farmer will not have anything left.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess] said something about the revival of the War Finance Corporation, did he not? I do not recall, but I think he included that as one of the achievements of the Republican Party. Well, I had something to do with that measure, and I remember very well how we revived the War Finance Corporation and the forces we had to combat. We did it over the protest of the Republican leaders of this House, including the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess], and the Record will prove it. We not only brought it out of the Committee on Banking and Currency over the protest of the Republican leaders but we brought that measure out of the committee over the protest and vote of the majority of the Republican members of the committee, including the Republican chairman himself. The minority of the Republican members of that committee, led by the very able gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Skonec], joined the solid Democratic members of that committee, who can always be depended upon to see that agriculture in both the West and South is given fair treatment in Congress, and by their combined vote brought the bill out of the committee and up for consideration in the House.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. With pleasure.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman stated we revived the War Finance Corporation over the protest of the majority Republican leaders. I want to ask if we did not also revive it over the protest and veto of President Wilson?

Mr. WINGO. Well, the gentleman is about as accurate in his premises as he is in his facts. I did not say over the majority Republican leaders but a majority of the Republican leaders. A majority of the Republican leaders were with President Wilson, but an almost solid Democratic membership of the House joined a few Republicans from the agricultural States and put over that measure in spite of the Republican leaders and the veto. When I speak of Republican leaders I mean the constituted leaders of the Republican organization of the House. The real leaders on the Republican side are a few men from the agricultural States in the West who have their eyes open and are not under any pledge to the great financial interests in the East for their election. They have refused to follow the self-constituted Republican leaders on this floor but have joined the Democrats and thus have made it possible for the Democrats, even though a minority, to get through some relief for the farmers. I have the roll call before—

Mr. DUNBAR rose.

Mr. WINGO. I can not yield any more. I have only 20 minutes time in all, and—

Mr. DUNBAR. I would like the gentleman to answer the question regarding the President's veto.

Mr. WINGO. Well, you know some Republican Members still go on berating a man—

Mr. DUNBAR. I am not berating the man.

Mr. WINGO. Who has passed out of public life and who, when the tumult and the shouting shall have died, the passions and hatreds of the hour have passed away, and the bitter prejudices and partisan falsehoods shall have exhausted themselves, will stand forth in history as one of the greatest men of his day, who, whatever may have been his faults and mistakes, passionately loved his country and broke himself physically by applying all of his talents and energies to the point of nervous exhaustion to serve the country and mankind, and his achievements and unselfish labor for country and Christian civilization will be recalled with pride and admiration by every patriotic, honest American a long time after his petty, narrow, partisan, lying traducers shall have been forgotten by all save those who out of idle curiosity search the records and roll calls of the last Republican Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. No; I want to finish.

I was talking about the Republican leaders and their record on the revival of the War Finance Corporation as the best evidence of their position on that measure to which to-day those same leaders refer with pride as proof of their achievements for which they claim credit. Turn to page 543 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 18, 1920, and you will find the roll call on the passage of the resolution for the revival of the War Finance Corporation; and lo and behold, of the men who fought that resolution, which now is admitted has done so much for agriculture, and who voted against that relief, the name of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess], chairman of the Republican congressional committee, like that of Abou ben Adhem, leads all the rest, and yet he to-day has the affrontery to stand up here as a leader of the Republican Party and claim credit for having "rehabilitated" American agriculture, and cites this act, which he opposed and against which he voted, as one of the measures that did it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On that roll call voting against this measure of relief for the American farmer I noticed the name of Mr. McFADDEN, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the committee that reported the measure to the House. I also note as voting against the resolution the name of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden]. I could, if time permitted, call the names of the other Republican leaders who voted against the farmer that day, including the name of that distinguished, brilliant, versatile, dashing leader, of whom I am very fond, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh].

Oh, yes, gentlemen, you remember what was said then about the Democrats and the Republican Members from the West who were trying to do something for the American farmer. We were denounced then as political grandstand players and demagogues, and they and their followers in the press talked in tones of derision and simulated fear of the "agricultural bloc," and yet to-day these same Republican leaders come forward and claim credit for their party and this Congress for the passage of those measures which they derided then and which were passed through this House by the Democratic membership, joined by a sufficient number of Republican Members from the agricultural States in the West, who were even derided by their party leaders and denounced for joining the Democrats.

The only difference in the minds of some gentlemen between a statesman and a demagogue is that the statesman, according to those gentlemen, is one who wants to open the Treasury to the railroads of the country and then give them rates that will guarantee a fixed profit and exempt the big financial interests of the country from a just proportion of the burden of taxation, and that a demagogue is one who recognizes the elemental truth that the cotton grower of the South and the wheat grower of the West ought to be given equality of treatment in the distribution of credits and in the enactment of laws that affect their economic welfare. Whenever a few Republican Members join the Democrats for this laudable purpose they are referred to sneeringly as an "agricultural bloc" and are told they are about to wreck the Republican Party. Notwithstanding the protest and declamation of these Republican leaders, to-day the Members of this House know that during the last two and a half years since Republicans have been in the control of Congress the only way the American farmer has gotten any consideration has been by the rolling of the Republican leaders of this House. And the printed record shows it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What about the act passed in this Congress which increased the agricultural credit facilities of the War Finance Corporation? The same old story. The leaders of the Republican Party, while professing sympathy for the farmer, sought by subterfuge and by substitution to defeat it. The administration leaders had worked a flank movement in the Senate on the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Norris, and tried to pass a makeshift. When the measure reached the House Banking and Currency Committee the solid Democratic membership of that committee were joined by enough Republicans to report the measure out to the House, and here on the floor you know that the Democrats, joined by those brave, loyal Republicans from the West who put country above party, such as Strong of Kansas and two other members of the committee, rolled the Republican leaders again and passed the measure over their opposition. It is true that while they were really opposed to the measure they made "discretion the better part of valor" and voted for the measure on the final roll call, but it was a fact understood by all of us that we had the silent, stubborn opposition of a majority of the Republican leaders, who, while voting for the measure, did so on the theory that the case was hopeless and that it was wisdom "to join what they could not beat." In spite of that well-known fact, the gentleman from Ohio now tries to show that as an achievement of the Republican Party when the record shows to the contrary.

Now, what else was done? Explain why the Federal land banks can not meet the demands of the farmers of the West and the South for $1,000, $2,000, or $3,000 loans? It was a recognized fact that these banks on account of conditions growing out of the war and their suspension while the case attacking their constitutionality was pending in the Supreme Court and not on account of any unsoundness of the system were left with an insufficient working capital to make them independent and enable them to stand alone. The Democrats solidly supported every effort to go to their relief, but the Republican leaders had their way and cut down the relief and after, first, by an arbitrary rule limiting their activities to a total of $200,000,000 a year that same leadership has now cut down the limit to $150,000,000 a year. The roll calls of this and the last Congress show that the Democrats were united for every practical proposal to grant adequate relief, and their efforts were defeated by the Republican leadership who grudgingly permitted measures to pass only granting partial relief.

What about transportation rates? At the very hour the Republican Party was trying to open the Treasury to the special interests of this country the railroads in the public press were announcing that they were going to make some small reductions in freight rates, some of these same railroads were filing notices of increases, and the shippers of my own State were put to the expense of combating these efforts and sending their attorneys and representatives here to Washington within the last few months. We saw the markets of the farmers of the West and the South restricted and in some instances destroyed by prohibitive, nonrevenue-producing freight rates while this Republican Congress was busy playing politics and seeking to relieve the great financial interests of a just proportion of the burden of taxation, and unless this Republican Congress does more to relieve that situation in the next session than it has in this, truck growing and some other farm activities in the West and South will be absolutely destroyed because even with the proposed slight reduction just announced transportation rates in many cases will remain so prohibitive that the farmers will not be able to get some of their products to market.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. For a question.

Mr. DENISON. I would like the gentleman to state what Congress could do right now.

Mr. WINGO. I will tell you.

Mr. DENISON. Wait a moment. I wanted to ask a question.

Mr. WINGO. You asked a question. You asked me what Congress could do, and I will tell you: You could do what this Republican Congress has failed to do. A Republican Congress enacted the transportation act which contains a provision that is practically in its effect mandatory on the Interstate Commerce Commission, and so admitted on this floor, to increase freight rates. If it was sound policy for Congress to say when freight rates should be raised, then, in the name of reason, why is it not sound policy for this Republican Congress to recognize that the increased freight rates are not only unfair and unreasonable from the shipper's standpoint but are non-revenue producing from the railroad standpoint, and say that the rates shall be reduced to a basis that is both fair and reasonable and also revenue producing. That is the answer to your question. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. WINGO. I yield for a question.

Mr. DENISON. I want the gentleman now to answer the question I asked of him first. What is it that he would have Congress do to reduce freight rates?

Mr. WINGO. I have just told you.

Mr. DENISON. I did not understand.

Mr. WINGO. You could do the same thing that you did to increase freight rates. This Republican Congress boasts, and you are boasting now, that you passed a law that you know was intended to increase freight rates. If this Congress should direct the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce transportation rates to a fair and reasonable revenue-producing basis, then freight rates will be reduced.

The gentleman says he did not understand, and I do not want to leave the gentleman's mind in the dark. I have a great respect for the gentleman, although I do not always agree with him. Of course, he does not want to admit that this Congress has not done anything to relieve the country of prohibitive freight rates. What he says implies by inference that it is powerless, but you have not the excuse now that you had in the last Congress, because now you have a President at the other end of the Avenue, as well as both branches of Congress under your control. Your excuse in the last Congress was that notwithstanding you had absolute control in both branches, yet there was a sick Democratic President in the White House, and this broken man in the White House scared you so that you did not do anything. You said then, "Just let us be given full power in both the executive as well as the legislative branches and we will do something." That was your answer in the last campaign to the farmers when they complained of prohibitive freight rates.

Now, in this Congress what is your alibi? Your alibi now is that the Democratic minority, small though it is, is so pestiferous, ingenious, resourceful, and active that it will not permit the Republican Congress to function. The fact is that you are in overwhelming control of every branch of the Government and you have it in your power to bring about a reduction of transportation rates. You have authority and power to pass a resolution that will be recognized by the Interstate Commerce Commission and it will require them to immediately reduce transportation rates so that they will be fair and just and reasonable, with due regard to the service rendered as well as a regard for the right of the owners for a fair return on their money invested. They should not only be fair and reasonable from the standpoint of the farmer, who now in some instances has to lose his products on account of prohibitive rates, but fair and reasonable to the railroads, because every sensible man knows, and the gentleman knows, that the present freight-rate structure in the United States is not only nonuniform and discriminatory but in many instances they are not even revenue producing, because they make it impossible for many commodities to move and thus commodities perish on the farm, so that not only does the farmer lose his market but the consumer loses the supplies much needed and in turn the railroads lose the revenue. The railroad executives recognize that this is true, because they have recently announced that they intend to make certain small reductions, and they set up the claim that there have been a great many reductions, but they overlook the increases that have been made in many instances, both directly and by reclassifications, and the efforts that are being made in some sections of the country to make other increases.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. On cattle, now, the freight rates are just one-third of what the animal will bring.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; and it is more than that on some commodities. I want to be fair to the railroads, because I recognize that an efficient, stable, transportation system is an economic necessity. The trouble with the viewpoint of the Republican leaders is that in the enactment of the transportation act you had but one purpose in view, which purpose was very plainly stated a few days ago before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate by Edgar E. Clark, formerly chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who, among other things, stated that the purpose was to give some stability to railroad securities and railroad finances and to allay apprehensions that were extant as to the future of railroad credit. "The purpose of it was to build up railroad credit," he said.

You consider nothing but the alleged rights of the railroads and neglect entirely the rights of the public. I regard the rights of the public as being just as fundamental and elementary as the rights of the railroads and more so, because the rights and privileges of the railroads are based upon, and grew out of, public necessity for transportation. The granting of certain privileges to railroad corporations—for instance, the right of eminent domain—was based not upon any inherent right flowing from capital investment but solely on the grounds of public policy for the benefit of the public, the right being the exercise of a sovereign power through a designated agency not for private but for public good. I repeat, I want to be fair to the railroads and am willing to give them a just and reasonable charge for the service they render, but I do not want the rights of the shipper ignored and subordinated to their rights. In other words, I want all legislation to be bottomed on the prime consideration of public good and a guaranty to it of efficient transportation service at reasonable rates and not solely upon a tender solicitude for the railroad stock market. I submit that the rights of both the shippers and the railroad owners can be safeguarded by proper rates. As a matter of fact, I earnestly believe that a reduction of rates in a great many instances will increase instead of decrease the revenue of the railroads because in many instances the present rates are prohibitive, so that commodities do not move, whereas if a more reasonable rate were fixed the commodities would move and the railroads would get the revenue which now they do not receive.

I can not understand how it is "statesmanship" to in effect guarantee a fixed return by a mandatory direction to increase rates and "demagoguery" if you provide adequate machinery to give to the American farmer at least a fair and reasonable return on his toil.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it is a little difficult to form an opinion as to the reason, or lack of reason, for the sort of speech that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has just made. Just what the gentleman wants I do not know. I doubt if he knows himself. He complains of high freight rates. So do we all. He wants them reduced. So do we all, and we have been working faithfully in that direction. But, unfortunately for the gentleman, he is apparently misinformed upon some things. He talks about a guaranty to the railroads. There is no guaranty to the railroads. Everybody knows that who knows anything about the transportation act. We guaranteed 6 per cent to the railroads for six months. Those six months expired over a year ago. There is now no sort of guaranty to the railroads. The gentleman knows it. Why does he keep talking about a guaranty when there is none in the law? Is it for the purpose of misleading people who do not have the opportunity to read the law and who do not know?

We are hoping for a reduction of freight rates. A 10 per cent reduction has just been announced. I hope there will be more. But this Congress has set up a tribunal whose duty it is to fix freight rates on a just, fair, and equitable basis, and the freight rates fixed by that tribunal, notwithstanding they are higher than we wish they were, are not returning to the railroads 3 per cent on the value of their property as fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, I would be very glad indeed if the widows and orphans and other people owning railroad securities could get along with less than 3 per cent on their investment. I think rates should be placed just as low as they can be, but the gentleman knows, and everybody knows, that the railroads can not carry the business of the country at a loss. On this side we want to do everything that can be done to reduce the cost of transportation and have been working to that end.

Every reduction of wages and every reduction of cost must be reflected in a reduction of rates, but so long as the roads are receiving only from 2 to 3 per cent of return, why does the gentleman talk about the Congress having been derelict in its duty in not proceeding to do what the gentleman himself would not vote to have the Congress do, arbitrarily fix a freight rate without any regard at all to the cost of the service. I do not think that what the gentleman has said really needs any answer; but lest some one unfamiliar with the facts should pick up the last page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and say, "Here is a challenge that has not been answered," I take occasion to remark that we join with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] in his desire, if he has the desire, for the reduction of freight rates, and we will use every practical means to accomplish that reduction; but we know that no one can carry freight or perform any other service for less than its costs, and we believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission, performing its duty under the law, will insist upon a reduction of rates corresponding with all reductions of costs. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H.
